THE EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE ROMANS.

WE now enter upon the epistolary part of the New Testament, concerning which it may be profitable to make some previous remarks.—The epistles are letters, written either to individuals, to particular churches, or to several churches; or they are catholic epistles, that is, circular letters to the churches in general. It is supposed that they were all written by one or other of the apostles; and, excepting the epistle to the Hebrews, and the epistles ascribed to John, each has the name of an apostle prefixed to it. The apostle Paul's name is affixed to thirteen epistles, and the epistle to the Hebrews has generally been ascribed to him: that of Peter, to two; those of James and Jude, to one each. Now, if they were actually written by the apostles, what shadow of reason can there be in the opinion, which numbers maintain, that they are not to be considered as of equal authority with the gospels? The gospels indeed record the words and actions of Christ; but the human testimony, by which these words and actions were recorded, might even be thought inferior to that of the epistles; for neither Mark nor Luke were apostles: and we have as full proof that the epistles were divinely inspired, as that the gospels were. Various reasons may be assigned, why many truths should be more obscurely delivered, during our Lord's ministry than afterwards, of which he gave several intimations: (Notes, Matt. 10:27,28, v. 27. Luke 12:49—53. John 16:12,13.) and where are we to look for the full and explicit declarations of “the whole counsel of God,” but in the writings of those, whom the Lord Jesus selected as the depositaries of his truths; to whom he gave “the keys of the kingdom of heaven;” to whom he promised to give the Holy Spirit, “to teach them all things, and lead them into all truth;” and whom “he sent” to make known his gospel, even “as the Father had sent him?” (Notes, Matt. 16:19. John 14:25, 26. 20:19—23, vv. 21—23.) If the doctrine of the apostles was the unadulterated and entire truth of God, and altogether of divine authority, as they preached it; why should it not be so when they committed it to writing? and if it was not the unadulterated entire truth, but either redundant or defective; then Christianity was corrupted or mutilated, even from the first. It must also be observed, that it is impossible, that we can know what the apostles preached, except from what they themselves wrote, or what others wrote concerning them: and can we suppose that their own writings are of less authority, than the writings of others on the same subject? If there be any ground for making this distinction, between the gospels and the apostolical writings, how is the church “built on the foundation of apostles and prophets?” (Notes, Eph. 2:19—22. Rev. 21:9—21, v. 14.) ‘Hence then it follows, that what the apostles have delivered in these epistles, as necessary to be believed or done by Christians, must be as necessary to be believed and practised in order to salvation, as what was personally taught by Christ himself, and is contained in the gospels.’ Whitby.

Most of the epistles, especially those of St. Paul, were written to those churches, the planting of which is recorded in the Acts of the Apostles: and the history so entirely coincides with them, even in the most minute particulars, and evidently without the least design or aim at coincidence; that the more carefully they are examined, and compared with the history, the more evident will it appear, that both are indisputably genuine. This has been clearly shown by the learned Dr. Paley, in his Horæ Paulinæ: and I am decidedly of opinion, that all the genius, sagacity, and care of any number of the most able men who ever lived, would be absolutely insufficient to forge a history, and a number of epistles, so manifestly frank, artless, and often immethodical; and yet to make the one so completely to confirm the other. If ever books had such internal evidence of being genuine, that no reasonable man, after a diligent examination of them, could doubt of it, these are the books. But if the epistles be genuine, they must be inspired, and also prove the divine original of Christianity.—Our Lord, not only foretold his own death and resurrection, and that before the destruction of Jerusalem, and in that generation, the gospel should be very extensively preached; but he promised to invest his apostles and disciples with miraculous powers, and especially with the gift of tongues, in order to accomplish this object.—Now I desire to know, whether any thing of this nature ‘was ever undertaken, or laid as the foundation of their credit, by any other authors of any doctrine, religion, sect, or heresy? Whether they ever made their own violent death, and resurrection, the foundation of their veracity? Or promised the like powers and assistances when they were risen, to those who should promote, or should embrace their doctrine? Or whether that, which no man else durst undertake, was not performed by the holy Jesus so effectually, as that his doctrine presently prevailed, and was received throughout the world, in spite of all the opposition of men and devils made against it; and wrought in Christians such a lasting faith, as time, and vice, though most concerned to do it, was never able to de-face?’ Whitby.—To the fulfilment of these promises, the apostles (especially St. Paul,) in these epistles continually refer, as to facts most certainly known by those, to whom they wrote; and which none could deny or question. They appeal to the churches, whether they themselves had not exercised these miraculous gifts among them, nay, conferred them on others: they argue with them, from these gifts, as to the truth of their doctrine, when heretics perverted it; they appeal to these gifts, as deciding between them and their opposers, they lay down rules, for the behavior of the churches in respect of them; and they sharply reprove several instances of misconduct in this particular. Can it then be doubted, that supposing the epistles genuine, these miraculous gifts were publicly exercised and conferred, and that all knew them to be so? And if this were the fact, was not the promise of Christ fulfilled? Is not Christianity from God? And can it be supposed, that the writers, who exercised and conferred these powers, in so conspicuous a manner, were left to themselves, without the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, in addressing the churches on the most important subjects, and transmitting their doctrine to posterity?

The epistles in general are written in language which shows, that if genuine, they must have been known by the churches, to which they were addressed, during the life of the writers: but can it be supposed, that such facts were spoken of as undeniable, during the lives of the writers; and yet, that no one of their opposers, either heretics or persecutors, (not to say their friends,) knowing that no such facts had taken place, should stand forth publicly to deny or confute them?—It is also undeniable, that most of the epistles were known, at a very early period, to other churches, as the writings of the apostles whose names they bear. In a short time translations were made of them into other languages, copious quotations were taken from them, and homilies, or expositions, were made on them. The churches, with one consent, acknowledged them as the word of God; and neither heretics, schismatics, nor opposers of the gospel, denied that they were the genuine writings of the apostles, and the standard records of Christianity. But had these epistles, bearing the name of this or the other apostle, been brought forward after their death, when no one, either in the church specially addressed, or in other churches, had ever before heard of them; can it be conceived, but that they would have been rejected as spurious? It is evident the claim would have been absurd, and the imposture manifest. Had they not been known during the life of the writers; at what time, or in what manner, could it have been possible to palm them on the church, and obtain them the credit of apostolical writings?

The epistle to the Hebrews, not bearing the name of St. Paul; that of James, which it seems at that time, as well as in later ages, was supposed irreconcilable with the doctrine of St. Paul; the second epistle of Peter, which probably was written just before his martyrdom, and was not generally known till after his death; and the second and third epistles of John, in which he only styles himself “the elder,” were not for some time received by the churches, as genuine; but this shows the scrupulous caution of the primitive Christians in this respect; and further inquiry, together with internal evidence, at length obtained the admission of them into the sacred canon. (Prefaces to the epistles to the Hebrews, James, the second of Peter, and the three epistles of John.) Yet very many writings, which, in some places, and for a time, were admitted as apostolical and divine, were afterwards, on fuller investigation, rejected, and most of them have sunk into oblivion.

The epistolary part of the New Testament, while it more fully shows the accomplishment of the ancient prophecies, concerning the establishment of the Messiah’s kingdom, than even the historical part has done; contains also many remarkable prophecies, several of which have already received as remarkable an accomplishment; but some still remain to be fulfilled. (Notes, Rom. 11: 2 Thes. 2:1—12. 1 Tim. 4:1—5. 2 Tim. 3:1—5. 2 Pet. 2:3.) This also constitutes an irrefragable proof, that they were written by inspiration of that God, who sees the end from the beginning.

Finally, it will appear, as we proceed, that the writers of these epistles speak of themselves, and of each other, as authoritatively delivering the truth and will of God to mankind. Even the exceptions, (as they are supposed to be,) in a few instances, more undeniably established the general rule: for why should an apostle intimate, that he only gave his own opinion, and not a divine and authoritative injunction, in a particular case; unless conscious, and almost demanding his readers to allow, that in all other cases, he “spoke as moved by the Holy Ghost?” But if they advanced these claims, what alternative is there, between admitting them to the full extent, or decidedly rejecting them? That is, What alternative is there, between receiving the apostolical epistles as the infallible word of God, and the standard of truth and duty; and wholly rejecting them as bold impostures? Had no such claims been advanced; it might have been allowed, that they were good men, right upon the whole, yet erroneous in some things: yet on this supposition where shall we find a divine standard of Christianity? But as the case is, either they are infallibly right, their doctrine divine, their writings the standard by which all other doctrines must be tried; or they claim for themselves and each other, what they had no right to claim. I would be very cautious, in venturing on this ground; but I am fully persuaded, and often feel most deeply grieved by the assurance, that far more injury is done to the cause of truth, by a half-hearted allowance, that the epistles (or other parts of scripture) are genuine, authentic, and instructive, but possibly in some things erroneous; than by all the open attacks of infidels. For these plausible statements leave us no standard of truth and duty; no way of discriminating between true doctrine and heresy; no divinely appointed exhibition of the Christian religion, with which all other exhibitions must be compared, and admitted or rejected as they agree or do not agree with it.

In the Acts of the Apostles, a history, or specimen, is given of the manner, in which the apostles and their fellow-laborers fulfilled the former part of their risen Lord’s commission given to them just before his ascension, “Go ye therefore and teach” (or make disciples of) “all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.” In the epistles is more fully shown the particulars, and the way, in which they executed the latter part of it; “Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you.” (Notes, Matt. 28:19,20. Mark 16:14—16.) The former therefore is more exactly suited to the case of missionaries, and persons in similar circumstances: the latter to stationary pastors and their flocks, as far as they are true believers. Both, however, are essentially requisite to an accurate and comprehensive view of Christianity, and of the office and duties of its ministers.

The peculiar doctrines of the gospel are here more explicitly stated and explained, and their practical tendency more argumentatively shown, than in the historical books. The distinguishing truths, here laid down, have been kept in view through the whole of the preceding exposition: and it will therefore be unnecessary formally to answer those, who have endeavored to reconcile this part of the scripture, with systems of a contrary nature and tendency. It may, however, be proper to say, that the author has considered with much attention both Dr. Taylor’s key to the epistle to the Romans, and the eminent Mr. Locke’s comment on several of the epistles: but, deeply convinced, that both of these publications “darken counsel by words without knowledge;” he can only on some incidental matters deduce instruction from them. In general, if the various terms, used in scripture concerning Israel as a nation, be in the same, or nearly the same, sense to be applied to Christians under the New Testament, where is the type and the antitype? Where is “the true Israel,” as distinguished from “Israel after the flesh?” And where are we to learn either the character, privileges, or duties of true believers?

Several of the epistles were written on special occasions, but others were not. These special occasions, however, were of such a nature, as gave the most favorable opportunity for explaining doctrines, enforcing precepts, and giving admonitions and counsels, of the greatest importance to the church of Christ in every age. Nor has any thing ever yet been devised, more suited to render “the word of God of no effect,” than the notion, that we have little or nothing to do with this and the other part of scripture, and can conclude nothing general from it, because it was “written on a particular occasion.”

We begin with the epistles of the apostle Paul, who wrote, as well as labored, more abundantly than all his brethren. Fourteen of his epistles are reserved for our instruction. In all his writings we perceive evident proofs of a sound judgment, a talent for close reasoning, a lively imagination, and fervent affections: sometimes, yet not so often by far as many have supposed, he induces a measure of obscurity by long parentheses. All his abilities and endowments, however, were directed and superintended by the Spirit of inspiration.

The epistle to the Romans is placed first, though some others were written before it: but it was addressed to the Christians, who resided in the capital city of that great empire, which then lorded it over the whole known world; and the epistle itself is one of the longest, and most comprehensive, of all that were written by the apostle. It is not known when, or by whom, the gospel was first preached at Rome; but it is conjectured, that it was carried thither by some of those Jews, who were converted at the day of Pentecost. (Acts 2:10.) Paul, however, had not yet visited that city; but, as ‘the apostle of the Gentiles,’ he deemed it proper to use this method of establishing the believers in the faith; and of giving them such a comprehensive view of the Christian religion, as might put them upon their guard against false teachers, of various descriptions.—This epistle is the only part of the scripture, in which divine truth is delivered in a systematical method: and it is a proper model for any one, who intends to compile a body of divinity. After the introduction, the apostle opens his subject, (as it is reasonable to begin systematical treatises,) by showing man’s relations and obligations to God his Creator, and his apostasy from his worship and service: he proceeds to prove the universal sinfulness of both Gentiles and Jews, and the impossibility of any man’s justifying himself before God, by his own obedience. Having brought the whole world in guilty, deserving of wrath, and shut up under sin and condemnation; he proceeds to state the method of salvation by the mercy of God, through the redemption of his Son, and the way of justification by faith in his blood, and the imputation of his righteousness, as "the righteousness of God, which is unto and upon all that believe." This he proves, illustrates, and exemplifies very fully: he next proceeds to show that this way of justification is closely connected with sanctification, and evangelical obedience: he then states the believer's experience and conflicts; and displays his character, hopes, and privileges: and at length he leads our reflections back to the source of these blessings, in the eternal election, and sovereign love and mercy of God. Having thus stated and proved doctrines, and answered objections to them, and discussed several questions respecting the calling of the Gentiles and the rejection of the Jews, he applies the whole discourse by a variety of practical exhortations, precepts, and instructions, enforced by evangelical motives. And, having touched upon some particulars, suited to the circumstances of those times, he concludes with affectionate salutations, cautions and prayers, and with ascribing glory to God our Saviour.

CHAP. I.

The apostle shows his apostolical authority, and the great subject of his ministry, 1—5. He salutes the Christians at Rome, 6, 7; thanking God on the ir-account, and praying for them; especially that he might come and preach among them, 8—15. The gospel is the power of God to salvation, and shows the only way of justification, 16, 17. All men of every nation are exposed to the wrath of God, for acting in opposition to the light afforded them, 18—23. A just but awful description of the Gentile world, as given up, by the just displeasure of God, to the grossest idolatries, the most degrading licentiousness, and the most atrocious iniquities, 24—32.

Note.—According to the custom of those times, the apostle began this epistle, by prefixing his name and distinguishing title. (Notes, Acts 15:22—29, v. 23. 23:25—30, v. 26.) The Christians at Rome would receive this letter from Paul, who was also called Saul, and had been a persecutor of the church; but who now regarded it as his honor and happiness, to be "the servant of Jesus Christ, and his called apostle;" having been "separated," and appointed, by the choice and effectual calling of God, to preach his gospel to the world, and to spend his subsequent life in promoting it. (Marg. Ref. a—e.—Note, Gal. 1:15—24.) This doctrine was no new discovery or invention, but the fulfilment of the promises made in the sacred scriptures by the prophets; and it respected the Son of God, even Jesus the Saviour, the promised Messiah, the Prophet, Priest, and King of the church, whom all believers acknowledged and obeyed as their Lord.

He was descended from David, according to the flesh, or in his human nature: but he had also been declared, or determined, to be the Son of God by that divine power, which raised him from the dead. (Marg. Ref. d—k.)—The expression, "according to the Spirit of holiness," has been generally interpreted to signify, "according to his divine nature;" but it is not used in that sense in any other place, nor does it obviously convey that idea. Others therefore explain it of the conception of Jesus by the Holy Spirit, on which account he was called "the Son of God:" but this does nothing more than state, what he was "according to the flesh," or in his human nature; whereas the apostle clearly intended to show his divine nature, as the "only-begotten Son of the Father;" and the antithesis as well as the context, evidently requires this. Our Lord indeed wrought all his miracles by the Spirit of God, which was "given to him without measure;" but the apostle plainly speaks of "the Spirit of Holiness," in immediate connexion with the demonstration, that Jesus was the Son of God, which arose from his resurrection from the dead. Now, the pouring out of the Holy Spirit on the witnesses of his resurrection, and all the stupendous effects which followed, both in respect of them, and of those on whom they laid their hand, were a divine attestation to their testimony; and thus Jesus, who was crucified for affirming that he was "the Son of God," was "declared," or "determined to be the Son of God, with power by his resurrection," according to the demonstration of that event, arising from the divers powers, signs, and miracles, which the Spirit of God enabled the apostles and primitive Christians to perform. (Marg. Ref. l, m.—Note, Heb. 2:1—4, v. 4.) It may also be observed, that the Holy Spirit had foretold, by the prophets, that the Messiah would be the Son of God, as well as the Son of David; and also that he would be put to death, and rise again, and enter into his glory. When, therefore, the Lord Jesus, having been put to death as a deceiver and blasphemer, arose from the dead, "ascended on high, ... and gave gifts to men;" especially by pouring out the Holy Spirit on his apostles and disciples, according to the predictions of holy men from the beginning, "who spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost;" he, in both respects, was "declared to be the Son of God with power, by his resurrection from the dead, according to the Spirit of holiness." Note.—From this glorious Saviour, Paul declared that he had received mercy and grace, as well as an appointment to the apostolical office; that he might be employed as his minister in bringing sinners of all nations to "the obedience of faith," by accepting of the Redeemer's mercy, and becoming the willing and devoted subjects of his kingdom, for the honor of his name in their salvation, worship, and service. (Marg. Ref. n—r.—Notes, 12:3—5. 15:14—21. 1 Cor. 15:3—11, vv. 8—10. 1 Tim. 1:12—14. 2 Tim. 1:11,12.) Among this happy and favored company were the persons to whom he sent this epistle; for they too had been "called" by the gospel, to become disciples of Jesus, to bear his name, and to trust and serve him. As Paul was "the apostle of the Gentiles," he considered himself peculiarly interested in their welfare, though they had not been converted by his ministry; he had therefore written this epistle to them: and he addressed it, not to the citizens of Rome in general, nor to the church of Rome, or at Rome, but to all those, who had been "called to be saints," or holy, separate, and sanctified persons, partakers of divine grace, and devoted to the service of God; and who were thus evidenced to be beloved by him, partakers of his mercy and plenteous redemption, renewed in a measure to his holy image in which he delights, and constituted heirs of his everlasting kingdom. (Marg. Ref. s—y.) These the apostle saluted by wishing them "grace and peace:" grace to pardon and justify them, and to sanctify their souls, and peace to comfort their hearts and consciences. Of these blessings, the sum of all happiness, he ardently desired that every professed Christian at Rome might participate: and that they all might continually have an accession made to that measure, which they had already obtained; as springing from the free mercy of God, the reconciled Father of all believers, and coming to them, through the Person, merits, and mediation of the Lord Jesus Christ.

This is the customary apostolical salutation; and it is most undeniably a prayer, or act of worship, in which Christ is addressed in union with God the Father. (Marg. Ref. z—c.—Notes, 14:13—18, v. 17. John, 14:27,28. 1 Cor. 1:3. Eph. 1:1,2. Phil. 2:5—8.) 12 That is, <sup>1</sup> that I may be comforted together * with you, <sup>2</sup> by the mutual faith both of you and me.

Note.—The apostle next assured “the saints at Rome,” that, though personally a stranger to them, he heartily “thanked his God, through Jesus Christ,” for the mercy which he had shown to them all; as their faith in Christ, and its happy effect upon their conduct, were spoken of in every part of the world. (Marg. Ref. d—g.—Notes, Phil. 1:3—6. 1 Thes. 1:1—8.) Wherever he went, he heard the commendation of the believers at Rome; and their good conduct was the more noticed by reason of the renown of that city, and the temptations with which they were surrounded. He could therefore confirm what he was about to say, by solemnly calling to witness that God, whom he worshipped and served; not only with constant and persevering diligence, but with inward fervency, zeal, and devotion; according to the display of his glory made in the gospel, and by promoting that doctrine which respects his Son, as the great Author and Subject of it. This glorious God was witness, that he prayed for them all, on every occasion, without intermission, or neglect; and he especially besought the Lord, that he would enable him to go among them, if after so long a time, and so many disappointments, he might at length be favored with a prosperous journey to come unto them, by the will and appointment of God. (Marg. Ref. i—m.—Notes and P. O. Jam. 4:13—17.)—The apostle’s language is, for substance, a most solemn oath, or appeal to the heart-searching God for the truth of what he said. (Marg. Ref. h.—Note, Matt. 5:33—37.) For he ardently desired to see and converse with them, that he might impart to them some of those spiritual gifts, which were generally conferred by imposition of the apostles’ hands, in order to their establishment in the faith. (Note, Acts 8:14—17.) And this he desired, in order that he might share the comfort bestowed on them, and rejoice in ministering to their joy; as well as in conferring with them, concerning the nature, object, and effects of that faith, which was held both by them and him. (Marg. Ref. q—u.)—St. Paul doubtless meant to remind the Romans of his apostolical character and authority, as sanctioning his doctrine, by which he intended to guard them especially against the judaizing teachers: yet he aimed to do this, in the most unassuming and affectionate manner possible; that he might give no disgust to any person, or furnish false teachers with any handle against him.—Some think that the Christians at Rome had received supernatural gifts; (12:6.) Yet it does not appear that any apostle had been there: Paul, however, expected that these gifts would be more abundantly imparted, when he should go among them; and that they would be thus fortified against such as attempted to pervert them, as well as against the fear of persecution.—It has been seen how his prayers for “a prosperous journey” to Rome were answered by his being sent thither as a prisoner! (Notes, 15:22—33. Acts 18:18—23. 25:—28:.)

13 Now <sup>x</sup> I would not have you ignorant, brethren, <sup>y</sup> that oftentimes I purposed to come unto you, (<sup>z</sup> but was let hitherto,) <sup>a</sup> that I might have some fruit * among you also, <sup>b</sup> even as among other Gentiles.

15 So, <sup>g</sup> as much as in me is, <sup>h</sup> I am ready to preach the gospel to you that are at Rome also. [Practical Observations.]

Note.—The apostle next showed, that he had repeatedly purposed to come to Rome; but that he had been hindered hitherto, by his multiplied engagements, and by the opposition made to his ministry: because he was exceedingly desirous to have some fruit among the Romans, as well as among the other Gentiles: for, as he had been converted in a most extraordinary manner, and entrusted with a dispensation of the gospel; he thought himself bound to do every thing which he possibly could, to promote the salvation of men in general, especially among the Gentiles. (Marg. Ref. x—b.) This was a debt, which he owed both to the civilized Greeks or Romans, and to the rude barbarians; and indeed to the learned and unlearned of every nation, from the wise philosopher to the untutored laborer. (Marg. Ref. c—f.) With this view of his obligation, he was ready, according to his ability and opportunity, to preach the gospel at Rome also: though in that haughty and magnificent capital, he might encounter more contempt and opposition, than in other places; and though his address might be less suitable to the fastidious taste of its refined inhabitants. (Marg. Ref. g, h.)

 pel of Christ: <sup>l</sup> for it is the power of God unto salvation, <sup>m</sup> to every one that believeth;
<sup>n</sup> to the Jew first, and also to the Greek.

Note.—However the noble, the learned, or the proud, might despise the doctrines of the gospel; and especially that of salvation by faith in the righteousness, atonement and intercession of a Jew, who had been crucified as a deceiver by his own countrymen; the apostle was in no wise "ashamed of" it, but was ready to glory in his belief of it before all men: he knew indeed, that the power of God attended, and was displayed by, that doctrine, for the salvation of every believer, not only from merited condemnation, but also from the power of his corrupt passions and habits, from the bondage of Satan, from the love of the world and the fear of men, and from all sin and misery: so that, while Jewish rabbies, and pagan philosophers, had tried in vain to reform men's lives;
 the despised gospel of Christ, wherever it had been preached, had been rendered extensively successful for that purpose. (Marg. Ref. i.—) This had first been evidenced among the Jews, in the conversion and holy lives of multitudes, who had before borne very bad characters:
 and afterwards it had produced similar effects among the Gentiles, vast numbers of whom had been turned from their immoralities and idolatries, to the holy worship and service of the true God. (Marg. Ref. n.—Notes, John 12:27—33, v. 32. 1 Cor. 1:20—24. 2 Cor.
 4:7. 10:1—6, vv. 4,5.)—"It is the power of God unto salvation." "To whom? To all that believe. Now it is plain, that it is not merely the power of God manifested in outward miracles, that is there spoken of; for miracles were wrought upon and in the presence both of them that believed not, and them that did believe. The power of God, there spoken of,
 is a power felt only by them that believe: so that whatever the enemies of the free grace of God may suggest; it cannot be meant of those extraordinary manifestations of power in healing men's bodies, &c. but of that inward teaching and drawing of the Father, of which the prophets foretold, that it would be bestowed in a large manner in gospel-times," Dr. Maclaurin. (Notes, John 6:41—46, vv.
 44,45,60—65, v. 65.)

17 For therein is <sup>o</sup> the righteousness of God revealed <sup>p</sup> from faith to faith: as it is written, <sup>q</sup> The just shall live by faith.

Note.—In the gospel, God had revealed, not only the righteousness of his perfect character and government, and the righteousness required by his holy law, but that also which he had appointed, provided, and introduced, for the justification of sinners before him. This might be called "the righteousness of God," for other reasons; but especially, because it consisted of the perfect obedience unto death of that glorious person, who is "God manifested in the flesh." 'This phrase, in St. Paul's style, doth always signify the righteousness of faith in Christ Jesus' dying, or shedding his blood for us. ... This righteousness consists not in our sanctification, but in our justification, or absolution from our sins past, through faith in the blood of Christ, shed for the remission of sins.' Whitby.—Therein is the righteousness, which is of the free grace of God, through Jesus Christ, revealed to be wholly of faith.' Locke. (Marg. Ref. o.)—The texts referred to, if duly considered, will prepare the reader to expect something still more appropriate, in this most remarkable expression; and a far higher privilege to believers, than these concessions, which are of no small importance, point out to us. (Notes, 3:21—26. 2 Cor. 5:18—21, v. 21. Phil. 3:8—11, v.
 9. 2 Pet. 1:1,2.) This "righteousness of God is revealed from faith to faith;" it is altogether of faith, from first to last, and without any respect to other distinctions, and the faith which receives it, is capable of continual augmentation: or rather it is revealed from the faithfulness of God in his word, to the faith of the believer: as by faith alone is the sure testimony and faithful promise of God received and appropriated: according to the doctrine of the prophet, that the truly just or righteous man "shall live," or be accepted and saved, "by faith," and not by works: or "the just by faith shall live;" no other justice, or righteousness, except that by faith, can bring the possessor to eternal life. (Marg. Ref. p, q.—Notes, Hab.
 2:4. Gal. 3:10—14, v. 11. Heb. 10:35—39.)

Note.—In vain does the evangelical doctrine exhort men to seek righteousness and 'salvation in Christ alone, apprehended by 'faith; unless all men be previously convicted 'as guilty of unrighteousness; which the apostle now begins to prove, concluding at the 'twentieth verse of the third chapter.' Beza.—The apostle here opens his main subject; and begins to show, that all men deeply need the salvation of the gospel, because none can obtain the favor of God, or escape his wrath, by their own works. The ignorant and deluded indeed might imagine that their supposed virtues would atone for their vices; but in fact "the wrath of God has been revealed from heaven," against every kind and degree of "ungodliness and unrighteousness of men;" not only against vice and immorality, in the conduct of men towards each other; but every failure of that reverence, love, gratitude, and honor, which are due unto God: even of "all those who hold the truth in unrighteousness." This revelation had been especially made by the holy law of God, and the Old Testament dispensation; and had now been more generally published and fully explained by the gospel. (Marg. Ref. r-t.) And though some extenuation might be admitted, in respect of those who had not been favored with "the oracles of God;" yet all men were found guilty, and exposed to this "revealed wrath," for "holding the truth in unrighteousness," or acting in opposition to their knowledge, and the conviction of their own consciences. All were acquainted with many leading truths, concerning moral duties; but their depravity imprisoned those truths, and so restrained them from duly influencing their conduct. All might have known far more than they did, had they not hated the light through love of sin. Indeed to this day, no man, of any sect or nation, perfectly lives up to his own principles: all, at some times and in some things, do what they know to be wrong, and omit what they know to be their duty. So that the plea of ignorance cannot be admitted, in its full latitude, in favor of any but idiots; for all rebel against that light, not only which they might have obtained, but which they actually possess. (Marg. Ref. u.)—This general principle the apostle proceeded to illustrate, by the state of the Gentile world. The pagans had not the light of revelation: but the works of creation preached to them; (Marg. Ref. x, y.—Notes, Ps. 19:1-6.) and that "which might be known of God," was made manifest even among them; for God had showed it to them from age to age, ever since the world was created. The wonderful formation of their own bodies and souls, as well as the various objects all around them, proclaimed these truths: so that, being endued with rational powers, they could not have failed of knowing the true God, as their Creator, Benefactor, and Governor, and in respect of many of his attributes, had it not been for the apostasy and carnal enmity of their hearts. Indeed God himself "dwelleth in light inaccessible," and his essential glory must be invisible to mortal eye: yet "his invisible power and Godhead" are so clearly reflected from the works which he has made, and visible in them, that his eternal and undeviated existence, his omnipotence, and other perfections, must be known from the beauty, excellency, variety, and immensity of his creatures, by all intelligent beings; except as their minds are debased and alienated from him by sin. (Marg. Ref. z-b.) Thus, even idolaters and Gentiles are left without excuse; and their ungodliness and unrighteousness are proved to be the effect of their depraved dispositions, rather than of their want of information, or the means of obtaining it. They all might have known more of God than they did, had they been properly disposed: and many of those who had discovered the vanity of the popular idolatries, and acquired some just notions of God and his worship, continued to act in opposition to their knowledge, from worldly motives. Thus "they imprisoned the truth in unrighteousness;" it is in vain to attempt an excuse for them; and the divine verdict, brought in against them, accords with the plainest dictates of justice and equity.—Revealed. (18) 'The words of St. Paul to the Athenians give light to these here to the 'Romans. Acts 17:22-31. Locke.—Ungodliness denotes the idolatry, irreligion, profaneness, and ingratitude to God, of mankind in general; and unrighteousness, their injustice, oppression, cruelty, and base conduct towards each other: the former may refer to the first table of the law; the latter to the second; yet, by both they rebelled against God and deserved his wrath.—Being understood, &c. (20) 'Or, "if they be minded they are seen." The 'invisible things of God lie within the reach 'and discovery of men's reason and understanding; but yet they must exercise their 'faculties and employ their minds about them.' Locke. (Notes, 28-32. Prov. 17:16.)

21 Because that, e when they knew God, f they glorified him not as God, neither were thankful; g became vain in their imaginations, and h their foolish heart was darkened.

[Practical Observations.]

22 i Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools;

23 And k changed the glory of the uncorruptible God into l an image made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and four-footed beasts, and creeping things.

Note.—‘Men of their own accord rushed into idolatry, to understand and condemn which they might have had light enough within, if they had not voluntarily extinguished it, partly by negligence, and partly by wickedness; ‘on which account the apostle says, that “they ‘detained the truth in unrighteousness.’” Beza. Idolatry was first introduced, and became general and perpetual in the world, through man’s depraved aversion to the holy character, worship, and service of the true God. The posterity of Noah had some knowledge of JEHOVAH; but they revolted from his service, and refused “to glorify him as God,” by their adoration, love, and obedience; neither were they thankful for the bounties of Providence, but abused them by intemperance, and forgot the Giver. (Marg. Ref. e, f) Thus impiety and iniquity made way for idolatry, which was become almost universal when God called Abraham. From that time, the same causes produced the same effects, in every part of the world. Indeed, some of the philosophers, of Greece and Rome, had acquired some indistinct knowledge of the being and perfections of the One Supreme God; and they speculated on subjects of this kind with a measure of acuteness and plausibility: yet they “glorified him not as God,” either by their avowed adoration, or in the conduct of their lives; nor were they thankful for his goodness to them. On the contrary, they sanctioned, by a hypocritical conformity, the stupid idolatries of their countrymen: and, proud of their superior discernment, they amused themselves with vain fancies, and reasonings, concerning matters too high and abstruse for them. Thus they were bewildered in inextricable mazes, and most of them took refuge in skepticism or atheism, in some of its varied forms. Their minds, being destitute of practical wisdom and understanding, became more and more darkened with error and delusion; and, while they professed themselves to be sages, wise men, and philosophers, they were insatuated, or turned into mere fools, or idiots, in the great concerns of God and religion. (Marg. Ref. g—i.—Notes, Gen. 6:5. 8:20—22, v. 21.) So that most of them relapsed into gross idolatry; and men in general concurred in exchanging the glorious Object of all worship for inanimate idols. They at first commonly “changed the glory of the incorruptible God, into the image” of a mortal man, which they foolishly supposed to be a proper resemblance of him: at length they made images of their deities, like birds, beasts, fishes, serpents, and insects; and thus actually fell down to worship the meanest and most noxious of the creatures. It is well known that many of the ancients, especially the learned Egyptians, worshipped dogs, snakes, reptiles, nay, even vegetables! Thus mankind, having retained from original tradition, or having acquired by the exercise of reason, some general notions of a Deity; invented numerous species of idolatry, and universally forsook the worship of the true God, in all places where revelation was not actually vouchsafed.—Indeed the fact is undeniably the same even to this day; and if any nations seem to be sunk into so entire a stupidity, as to have no notions of a God remaining among them, this still more clearly proves, not man’s want of rational powers, but his carnal enmity to God and religion, through which he becomes more and more the besotted and blinded slave of Satan. (Marg. Ref. k, l.—Notes, Ex. 20:3. 32:1—6. Ps. 106:19—23. Is. 44:9—20. Jer. 10:1—15. Acts 17:22—31.) Cicero’s books, ‘On the nature of the gods,’ contain many very striking illustrations of the apostle’s meaning.

creature * more than the Creator, " who is blessed for ever. Amen.

26 For this cause God x gave them up unto y vile affections: for even their women did change the natural use into that which is against nature:

27 And likewise also the men, leaving the natural use of the woman, burned in their lust one toward another; men with men working that which is unseemly, and receiving in themselves z that recompense of their error which was meet.

Note.—The fallen race of men, having thus dishonored God by wilful apostasy and idolatry; he left them, under the influence of Satan, to debase themselves by the most unnatural and abominable lewdness. This did not so much result from the prevalence of animal inclinations, (for the very brutes are kept from excessive and unnatural practices,) as from "the lusts of their own hearts," which madly sought satisfaction in sensuality, when they had lost the favor of God and happiness in him. Thus they disgraced their bodies, by using them to perpetrate with each other the most detestable pollutions: even those bodies, which the Creator had formed with most exquisite contrivance and good-will; as might best render them accommodated to the purposes of their own comfort and usefulness to one another, and to be the instruments of the soul in his worship and service. (Marg. Ref. m—p.) This was permitted judicially; because they had exchanged "the truth of God," which had been made known to them, respecting his nature, perfections, and worship, for the basest falsehoods and delusions of the devil, and the sophistical conclusions of their own vain reasonings: and, in consequence, they had rendered divine honor to creatures, in preference to the infinite Creator, who is in himself "most blessed for evermore;" whom all rational creatures ought to adore and bless; and whose praises are celebrated by all the inhabitants of heaven; while saints on earth repeat a cordial Amen to them. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. q—u.)—The idolaters first joined creatures with God in their worship, or adored them as mediators; then they used images to represent the invisible Object of their adoration; and at length the meanest of the creatures engrossed the whole of it. The Lord therefore, being provoked to jealousy by this base apostasy and ingratitude, gave them up to the vilest passions and inclinations; so that they were left to practise such unnatural lusts, as are not fit to be mentioned, except as a stigma on human nature, and to enhance the grace of our redemption. And this was a judgment "meet" for such a crime: as they had so dishonored God, through their pride and carnal enmity, it was proper for them to be left to dishonor themselves, and to expose their own shame; that the consequences of their apostasy, and the blindness of their boasted reason, as well as the filthiness of their hearts, might be known to the whole intelligent creation. (Marg. Ref. x—z.)—Those unnatural crimes and vile affections, which are most scandalous at present, and carefully concealed, or most severely punished, were openly avowed among the Greeks and Romans, even in their politest ages: and their most elegant and celebrated poets have defiled their compositions by the mention of such detestable amours, without any expressions of abhorrence, or even of disapprobation; nay, often in a way, which sanctions them, and almost wins the unwary reader to palliate, or even approve them!

32 Who <sup>n</sup> knowing the judgment of God, that they which commit such things are <sup>o</sup> worthy of death, not only do the same, but * have pleasure in them that do them.

Note.—Men, in all ages and nations, had shown a disposition and decided purpose to discard from their minds the knowledge of the true God. Having no delight in him, they did not endeavor “to retain him in their knowledge.”—Not approving the knowledge of Εβροβαν, men in every age and nation had been and were prompt to run into idolatry. This was an evident fact all over the Gentile world.—The glorious perfections, spiritual worship, and holy service of God, by no means suited the proud, sensual, carnal heart of fallen men: so that, as with one consent, they preferred the basest idols to him, because more congenial to their dispositions, and consistent with their favorite pursuits. (Marg. Ref. a.) In righteous judgment God gave them up to “a reprobate mind,” (rejecting God, and rejected by him,) that they should foolishly and perversely prefer the most shameful and pernicious practices, to those which are decent, honorable, and becoming rational creatures. Thus they were left to commit those crimes, which were utterly inconsistent with reason, nature, and their own and each other’s welfare. (Marg. Ref. b. c.) Nay, they proceeded to such lengths in wickedness, that their whole hearts and lives were filled with every kind of fraud, oppression, extortion, and iniquity: they practised all fornication, incest, and adultery without remorse: they delighted in mischief for its own sake: they rapaciously amassed wealth by every means in their power, however mean, iniquitous, and oppressive: they revenged every injury with desperate, implacable, and pertinacious malice: they envied all, who were more honored or prospered than themselves: they were prompt to commit murder, or engage in any kind of bitter contests, and to every species of deceit and malignity, or habitual mischievousness, as delighting in the misery of others. Secret calumnies and slanders were employed to ruin the characters of their neighbors or rivals: they were “haters of God,” and of his authority, law, justice, service, and providence, and despiteful to his worshippers, and to each other. They were proud of their genius, sagacity, learning, possessions, and exploits; they idolized themselves, in boasting of their virtues or performances, and in wholly seeking their own glory in the most ostentatious manner. They invented new species of cruelty, treachery, luxury, impiety, idolatry, sensual gratification, and magnificence. They cast off all regard to parental authority, and despised, injured, or even murdered their aged parents, as the emperor Nero did his mother Agrippina. They acted in many things, as if they had been destitute of common sense, by the indulgence of their headstrong passions: they violated without scruple the most solemn treaties, covenants, and oaths: they sinned away natural affection, and even exposed their new-born infants, leaving them to perish without remorse or censure, that they might not have the trouble or expense of bringing them up; and in many places they put to death their parents, when they became helpless and burdensome. They were implacable in their resentments, and unmerciful in their dispositions: so that, besides the cruel carnage of their ambitious wars, the indiscriminate slaughter which often attended the taking of cities, and the frequent murder of their vanquished enemies; their public diversions consisted in beholding gladiators fighting together, till hundreds were sometimes massacred before their eyes; or in seeing slaves and criminals fighting with wild beasts, and often devoured by them. Nor did the principal persons, whether men, or women, of the highest rank, and most cultivated manners in other respects, absent themselves from these horrid spectacles! (Marg. Ref. d—m.) Nay, even those among them, who were most fully convinced that these things were criminal, and deserving of condemnation and death according to “the judgment of God,” not only continued to practise them, but also delighted in, honored, caressed, flattered, preferred, or even deified, such persons, as were most notoriously addicted to them. (Marg. Ref. n, o.—Note, 2 Tim. 3:1—5.)—The history of the Greeks and Romans, especially of the latter, about the time when the apostle wrote, abundantly illustrates this horrid description of their general character, from which even their philosophers and moralists were by no means excepted. And not only their indignant, but their easy good tempered satirists, and their other poets and orators, drew such pictures of the public morals, as abundantly show that the apostle has not used any hyperbole, in this animated and awful description.—It might easily be shown, that the morals of idolatrous nations, if judged according to the immutable standard of the divine law, are at this day not at all better than the description here given of the Gentile world.—Have pleasure, &c. (32) ‘This, say the Greek commentators, is much worse than the bare doing of them: for a man may do them by the power of temptation; and by consideration become sensible of his folly, and repent of it: but when he is arrived at that height of wickedness, that he not only approves, but delights in seeing the like things done by others, he demonstrates such a strong affection to them as is incurable.’ Whitby.—The apostle, however, is showing what need the Gentiles, and all men, had of the grace of the gospel; and not that they were incurable by it: and in fact multitudes who once had answered this description, afterwards embraced Christianity, and became “a peculiar people zealous of good works.”

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

"A servant of Jesus Christ" is the highest style of man; and that of a minister or an apostle, only specifies the particular service in which he is employed; but the Christian slave is "a servant of Christ," as truly as the apostle.—All those who are thus distinguished have been "called" out of a state of darkness and alienation from God, and "separated" from their sinful connexions, by divine grace; and thus taught to believe, love, adorn, and promote the gospel of God. This gospel, though often treated as a new doctrine, and is new to those who have never before heard or read it, has comprised the whole hope of sinful man from the fall of Adam; and was promised by the prophets many ages before it was published by the apostles of Jesus Christ. He is the great Subject of the gospel, being "the Son of David," and "the Son of God," according to the testimony of the Spirit of holiness by the prophets, and the demonstration of his resurrection from the dead by the power of God, attested by the same Spirit. "From his fulness have all" his servants "received;" he gives grace to the sinner, and qualifies the believer, or the minister, for the work allotted to him: but in vain do any claim authority in the church, as successors to the apostles, when their lives evince that they have not received regenerating grace; and when instead of bringing others to "the obedience of faith," they themselves are evidently disobedient and unbelieving.—The end of the gospel-ministry is to bring sinners, of all nations, to obey the commands of God, by believing in his Son, and submitting to his authority; that his name may be glorified in their salvation and that they may become a peculiar people to show forth his praises. Happy they, who are thus "the called of Jesus Christ to be his saints," beloved of God and devoted to him! They should often recollect their character and privileges, that they may be excited to act consistently; and they should cordially desire and pray for an increase of "grace and peace" to all their brethren in every place. Without grace there can be no substantial peace: in proportion as grace is communicated, peace may be expected; and when grace shall ripen into perfect holiness, peace will become complete fruition. These then are the great blessings, which we should seek for ourselves, our children, our friends, and all around us, in preference to all earthly possessions or prosperity; and they must be sought from the mercy of God our Father, by faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, and by reliance on his merits and mediation.

V. 8—15.

Zealous Christians are always ready to thank God, in behalf of all others who partake of the same invaluable blessings, in which they themselves rejoice: and we should cultivate this pious and benevolent disposition, that we may present our grateful tribute to the Lord, not only for our friends, or such as have been converted by our means; but for strangers also, and for all concerning whom we hear a good report. Indeed if we "serve God with our spirit in the gospel of his Son," we shall be sure to approve our hearts before him, as deeply concerned for the peace and prosperity of his church: and we should also without ceasing, in our daily prayers, make mention of our fellow Christians, and the success of the gospel all over the world. Yet alas! most of us must own with shame, that we are not so earnest or particular in this respect, even in our narrow circles, as Paul was, in respect of his most extensive connexions, and with all his urgent and multiplied engagements. But we should endeavor to imitate him, even as he imitated Christ: and we ought to long for opportunities of usefulness, as worldly men do for a prosperous trade, or occasions of distinguishing themselves and acquiring celebrity: and count that the most successful journey, or undertaking, in which most good has been done or attempted; though it have exposed us to hardship, loss, or peril. We should earnestly request the Lord, that by his will, such opportunities may frequently return; though we know not in what manner our prayers may be answered: we should readily impart to others, what God has entrusted to us; whether to supply their temporal wants, or to promote their spiritual comfort and establishment: we ought to rejoice in making others joyful; and should peculiarly take pleasure, in communing with those, who believe, hope for, and experience the same things as we do. But purposes, resulting even from this happy and excellent state of mind, may often be retarded and disappointed; nor ought we to be discouraged or desist on this account. We should still desire and expect the opportunity of "bringing forth fruit," though we have been "hindered hitherto:" and, while we ought to be thankful for the least usefulness, we should not say of any measure, Let this suffice us, as long as we have health and strength for labor, and so much yet remains to be done before "all nations" are brought "to the obedience of faith." Being redeemed by the blood, and converted by the grace, of the Lord Jesus, we are altogether his: and for his sake, we are debtors to all men, to do them all the good we can; to whatever nation they belong, or of whatever complexion, rank, capacity, or education they are. Nor ought we to deem such services any great thing; but merely our bounden duty, our debt of devoted obedience to God, of gratitude to Christ, and of love to our neighbors and our brethren.

V. 16--21.

We ought not for a moment to allow of that absurd and hateful shame, which the enmity and contempt of the wicked against the gospel often excite in our minds. On the contrary, we should glory in the doctrine of the cross; and be ready to profess or preach it, in any place, or before any description of men, according to our ability and our call in Providence; as knowing, that it is "the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth," and that no sinner can be saved in any other way. It is indeed evident to this day, that learned speculations, and supposed rational schemes, or the elegances of admired orators, are not attended in general with that power, which converts sinners from impiety and immorality, to the love and service of God: but this effect is produced in some good measure, wherever the despised gospel is preached, even though it be in a homely manner, and by persons of inferior abilities, erudition, and elocution. For by the gospel is "the righteousness of God revealed;" his way of justification and sanctification is opened; and sinners are taught to trust in him, and to come before him, by faith in his mercy, through the righteousness, atonement, and intercession of his beloved Son. He will therefore honor this doctrine, because it honors his perfections, law, and government, and because it is his own appointment: and they who devise other schemes may put forth their own power to make them successful, if they can; but God will not own or countenance them.—The gospel is "worthy of universal acceptance:" "for the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men;" and all have been, in some degree at least, ungodly and unrighteous. No man can plead, that he has fulfilled all his obligations to God and to his neighbor; nor can any one truly say, that he has not "held the truth in unrighteousness," or that he has acted up completely to the light afforded him.—Whatever may be pleaded to the contrary, it is a certain fact, that atheism, infidelity, impiety, and idolatry spring from human depravity, not from unavoidable ignorance or mistake. The heathen nations might have known enough of God from his works, and the benefits conferred on them, to have excited their admiring love and gratitude, and to have influenced them to adore and obey their Creator and Benefactor; had they not shut out the light, or sinned in opposition to it: so that even they "were without excuse" in their apostasy and idolatry, however succeeding rebels against God may have vindicated and justified them. But, instead of glorifying him in humble gratitude, according to their measure of information, their pride and enmity induced them to indulge vain conjectures and reasonings; till their professed and boasted wisdom led them into the most palpable and degrading folly and stupidity. Thus idolatry, the stigma of man's understanding, was introduced and propagated, through the wickedness of his heart; and rational creatures exchanged the worship of the glorious Creator for that of brutes, reptiles, or inanimate images: and they continued to wander from God, till all traces of true religion must have been wholly lost, had not divine revelation, and especially that of the gospel, prevented it.

V. 22--32.

Whatever speculators may assume, of the sufficiency of man's reason to discover divine truth and moral obligation, or to regulate men's practice; stubborn facts confute the flattering hypothesis: and as far as God has in awful displeasure left men to themselves, they have dishonored him by the most absurd idolatries and superstitions, and degraded themselves by "vile affections," and abominable lusts; nor is it generally expedient to mention the enormities, to which they, who, "liking not to retain God in their knowledge," preferred their own inventions to his holy worship, have been given up; when, being left to "a reprobate mind," their deluded judgments, their perverse wills, and their depraved passions, have reciprocally helped to corrupt, and have been corrupted by, each other. A most horrid view of the moral character of the Greeks and Romans, even amidst all their prosperity, politeness, and erudition, is here set before us by the apostle: and the student, who judges of characters and actions by the law of God, will perceive, that our own historians, orators, and poets, amidst all their flattery and false coloring, adduce such facts, and make such representations, as fully prove the apostle's picture to be a real and striking likeness, and no caricature. Nay, the most illustrious and celebrated persons among them may be produced, as most exactly answering to this horrid description!—It must indeed be thankfully acknowledged, that Christianity has had considerable effect on mankind in general, in giving them more just notions of excellence, and in humanizing their manners, especially in respect of war: so that battles sometimes in later ages are scarcely more fierce and bloody, than the diversions of the savage Romans were. Our laws and customs also restrain, and drive into dark recesses, those abominations, which stalked abroad with horrid effrontery among the Pagans. There are also great numbers of real Christians among us. Yet, after all, what multitudes, even in this land, seem to be the original of the picture before us! They are full of all unrighteousness, and commit all uncleanness with greediness; or they gratify their enormous avarice by frauds, oppressions, extortion, and cruelty; or they are full of envy, deceit, contention, ambition, ostentation, malice, or malignity. Some rush upon murder from a diabolical pride and revenge, which they call honor; others vent their malice by whispering calumnies and slanders, to ruin their neighbor's reputation. Multitudes are so ingenious in contriving new species of fraud, perjury, impiety, or dishonesty; that legislators cannot keep pace with them, in devising new statutes to counteract their villany. While disobedience to parents is, alas! shamefully common; children are often as shamefully turned over to hirelings, and neglected by their parents, as if they were "without natural affection;" and it is too obvious, that numbers are implacable and unmerciful to those, whom they can exult over or oppress with impunity. Thus men show themselves to be "haters of God," and his holy service: not only by doing such things as he has forbidden, and adjudged deserving of his wrath; but by applauding, and taking pleasure in the company of those, who blaspheme his name and trample on his authority, as though they were the most worthy, generous, and excellent of the human race: while the pious servants of God are proportionably despised and shunned. These are they, who would discard revelation, and who count "the preaching of the cross foolishness." But their conduct demonstrates their need of it, and that it is a remedy which they must avail themselves of, or perish.—Finally, we may here observe, that religion moderates and regulates natural affections, but excess of depravity extinguishes them: that it is a proof of more determined impiety, for men to take pleasure in the company of the enemies of God, than to commit many crimes, whilst the heart and conscience protest against them: and that it is a peculiar cause for gratitude, if we have been restrained from these enormities, to which by nature we are as propense as any others of our apostate race.

CHAP. II.

Those who judge others, and yet transgress themselves, are inexcusable, and cannot escape the judgment of God, 1—6. The measure of his dealings with Jews and Gentiles as it will appear at the day of judgment, 7—16. The apostle solemnly expostulates with the Jews, who trusted in the law, and yet broke it; and shows that external forms will not profit, without a renewed heart and internal piety, which God would accept even in the uncircumcised, 17—23.

2 But we are sure that <sup>e</sup> the judgment of God is according to truth, against them which commit such things.

3 And <sup>f</sup> thinkest thou this, <sup>g</sup> O man, that judgest them which do such things, and doest the same, <sup>h</sup> that thou shalt escape the judgment of God?

Note.—The apostle is commonly supposed to have here passed from the state of the Gentiles, to animadvert on that of the Jews: though some think that the heathen philosophers and moralists were also included. He, however, seems to have expressed himself in a general manner, that he might include all those, of every nation, sentiment, or description, "who hold the truth in unrighteousness," or object to "the righteousness of God by faith," (Notes, 1:17—20.) and who are ready to judge and condemn others, though guilty themselves.

Of these, the Jews were the most notorious: for they disdained and abhorred the Gentiles as profane, abominable, and utterly excluded from the favor of God; and they thought themselves a holy people, entitled to all their privileges by an unalienable right. Yet, while they would join with the apostle in showing the inexcusable wickedness of the Gentiles, they were equally or more "inexcusable:" for they proudly arrogated, and severely exercised the office of a judge, though the sentence, which they denounced on others, actually condemned themselves; as they might be proved guilty of the very same crimes, or such as were of similar malignity. (Marg. Ref. a—d.) They copied the vices of the very heathen, whom they condemned; like them they acted in opposition to the light afforded them; and they were unthankful, rebellious, and unrighteous, even as the Gentiles were. But they, and all other persons in the world, whosoever they were that acted in this manner, must be reminded, that assuredly, "the judgment of God," according to the truth of his word, and the real character and conduct of men, would be executed on them; and instead of meeting with favor on account of their external advantages, or their condemnation of sin in others, their punishment would be enhanced by these very circumstances. For could any man suppose, that when he had committed the same crimes, which he judged deserving of punishment in others, he should himself escape the judgment of God? This intimated to the unbelieving Jews, that personal and national judgments awaited them, unless they fled for refuge to the grace of the gospel. (Marg. Ref. e—h.—Notes, Matt. 3:7—10. Luke 12:47, 48. Heb. 2:1—4. 12:22—25.)—"These Gentiles were by the Jews reputed as unclean, great sinners, and so incapable of salvation. ... 6. Who <sup>y</sup> will render to every man according to his deeds; [Practical Observations.]

Note.—The Gentiles were without excuse, because they were unthankful to their Creator and Benefactor. (Note, 1:21—23.) Did the Israelites then despise the exuberant riches of his kindness to them, whom he had so peculiarly favored? He had distinguished them, both by temporal and spiritual benefits, in every age: though they had always proved rebellious, he had still exercised immense goodness, forbearance, and long-suffering towards them; and he had at length sent his Son among them. Even after they had crucified him, he had in infinite mercy ordered the first proposals of his gospel to be made to them; and he still besought them, by his apostles and ministers, to accept of this salvation! And did they despise all this, as a small favor? Did it embolden them to continue in sin? Or did the Lord's abundant mercy and patience towards them lead them to conclude, that he would always favor them, however ungratefully they rebelled against him? (Marg. Ref. 1—1.—Note, Luke 24:44—49, v. 47.) If they thus despised his rich goodness, they strangely mistook its design and tendency; as it ought to lead and induce them to repentance.—The more kindness God exercises, the greater aggravation is there in the sinner's disobedience, and the more deeply should he be humbled for his base ingratitude. The patience of God gives the sinner time and opportunity for repentance, and the discoveries of his mercy furnish him with motives and encouragements; and were it not for man's total depravity, the proposals of the gospel must prevail with every one to repent of his departure from God, and to return to his worship and service. (Marg. Ref. m.—Notes and P. O. Luke 15:11—24. 2 Pet. 3:9,14—16.)—If the Jews presumed upon the special kindness of God to them; and continued to reject the gospel, and to disobey his commandments, according to the "hardness of their impenitent hearts," their condemnation would be proportionably severe; and the longer God had patience with them, the heavier vengeance would be executed on them. All others indeed, who thus employed the day of mercy in committing sin, and hardening their hearts in impenitence, because of the goodness of God, would find, that they had accumulated wrath as a treasure "for themselves," which would be secured for them, till the day of wrath and final recompense. (Marg. Ref. n—p.) Then the Lord will manifest the perfect justice of his decisions before the whole world, to the full satisfaction of all his friends, and the confusion of all his enemies: seeing he will then render to every individual "according to his works;" whether he was an obstinate unbeliever, or a humble penitent believer in the divine Redeemer. Note.—The apostle here gradually proceeds to a more explicit mention of the Jews, whom he especially intended to "conclude under sin." (Gal. 3:22.) According to the whole tenor of scripture, as well as the dictates of common sense, no sinner can do well, till he repents, submits to God, and seeks mercy from him. The Jew who did this, must have respect to the types and promises of a Saviour, with which the law of Moses was replete, as well as to the preceptive part of it; and he alone, who did this, would perform any spiritual obedience. (Note, Ex. 19:5.) If then there was a man, any where, who embraced by faith the revelation of "glory, honor, and immortality," through the promised Messiah, made in the word of God, and was earnestly desirous of obtaining this blessing; if he sought the inheritance, by repenting, "ceasing to do evil, learning to do well," attending on the ordinances of God, obeying his commandments, and thus waiting patiently for the completion of his promises; and if he proved his sincerity, by patience under trials, and perseverance in well doing, amidst temptations and difficulties;— this man would surely be made partaker of eternal life, according to the constitution of the most gracious covenant of God in Jesus Christ; whatever measure of explicit knowledge he might be favored with, or under whatever dispensation he might live. (Marg. Ref. s—x.) But, as all transgressors of the law are under condemnation; so those Jews, or others, who disputed against the Lord's method of saving sinners, and his sovereignty in dispensing unmerited favors; whose "eye was evil, because the Lord was good;" who were angry at the kindness shown to returning prodigals; (Note, Luke 15:25—32, v. 32.) and, who refused to obey the truth, by embracing the gospel and submitting to the promised Saviour; choosing rather to "obey unrighteousness," and continue the slaves of sin and Satan: all these persons would surely sink under the indignation and wrath of their offended Judge. For "tribulation and anguish" of spirit must be the inevitable portion of "every soul of man, who worketh evil;" and the Jew will have the first and most severe lot in this condemnation; though the unbelieving and disobedient Gentile will not be exempted. (Marg. Ref. y—e.) On the other hand, that "glory, honor, and peace," which God confers on the objects of his peculiar love, will certainly be given to "every man that worketh good," as one who "obeyeth the truth." (8) The Jew indeed had the first proposal of this mercy; but no Gentile was excluded from the full participation of it, "for God is no respecter of persons." (Marg. Ref. f—i.—Notes, Acts 10:1—8,34,35.)—It is evident that the apostle did not mean, that either Jew or Gentile could be saved by his own works, without faith in Christ; but that, "by obeying the truth," and by that "patient continuance in well doing" which springs from faith, the Gentile would obtain eternal life; and without this, the Jew must fall under wrath and condemnation. To suppose he meant, that any man, who heard the gospel without believing it; or who had any part of revelation sent to him, yet rejected it, could be saved; would absurdly make the apostle advance principles subversive of his own grand argument throughout the whole epistle, and of his doctrine in all his epistles. He had many reasons, for first proposing his doctrine in this covert and practical manner. He thus avoided giving immediate disgust to the Jewish reader, previous to the more explicit declaration of the gospel, for which he was here only making way: he intimated, that those, who really best understood and obeyed the law, would most readily embrace the gospel; and that the Jews did not refuse to "obey the truth" from love to the holiness of the law, but from "obedience to unrighteousness." Patient continuance in well doing. (7) Ὑπομονὴ ἐργασίας. "The perseverance of a good work." Ὑπομονή, 5:3,4. 8:25. 15:4,5. See on *Luke 8:15. Note.—No Gentiles could be found, who had perfectly acted according to the light of their own dispensation; so that none of those could be justified by their own obedience: yet, as they had "sinned without law," or without the advantages of a written authenticated rule for their conduct; they would "perish without law;" and be consigned to a milder punishment than the wicked Jews would be; who having sinned "in," or under, "the law," would be judged by the law, and fall under the awful curses denounced in it against the disobedient. (See on Note, 4—6.) The Jews indeed were apt to imagine, that the reading and hearing of the law, together with some attention to the legal ceremonies, would justify them before God, and atone for all their violations of the moral precepts: just as many professed Christians expect to be justified by some general attendance on outward ordinances, and a decency of moral conduct, though they are habitually guilty of many known sins and omit many evident duties. But the apostle declared, that the "hearers of the law could not be justified" by it: if they would seek acceptance in this way, they must be "doers" of the law: and if any thus perfectly performed its righteous demands, he might then indeed claim the reward of righteousness, but not otherwise. (Marg. Ref. k—o.—Note, Luke 10:25—29.) For even the Gentiles, who had not the written law, when from natural principles they performed any of those duties which the law required, were, in this respect, "a law unto themselves:" and by obeying thus far their own rule, came nearer to righteousness, than the Jews who broke their rule. The fragments of that law, which had originally been written in the heart, exerting their influence by a natural sense of right and wrong, appeared in their works. Their consciences also testified to the propriety of this part of their conduct, and produced an inward satisfaction: while, at the same time, their secret thoughts, or their reasonings one with another, served to accuse, or excuse themselves, or each other, according to the conformity of their conduct to their own sentiments of right and wrong, or the contrary. If then the very Gentiles could not but condemn themselves, when they acted against their own consciences; how absurd and presumptuous must it be for a Jew, to expect justification before God, by a law which he was continually transgressing! (Marg. Ref. p—u.)—A man accused of a murder which he did not commit, finds his conscience acquit him in that respect; though it may accuse and condemn him of robbery: and his not being guilty of the murder is no reason why he should be justified, as to the robbery. Reuben's conscience excused him, as to the cruelty exercised towards Joseph; but it accused and condemned him for incest. (Notes, Gen. 35:22. 42:21,22. 49:3,4.) To "perish without law" is widely different from "justification unto life;" of which the apostle gives not so much as any intimation. (Note, Matt. 11:20—24.) The apostle's argument by no means implied, that the Gentiles performed any spiritual obedience; or that any of them could be justified, on account of their partial and scanty compliance with the dictates of their own natural, and in very many things erroneous, conscience. As rational creatures, in a fallen state, yet not desperate, they sometimes acted more morally, than at other times; and accordingly their consciences approved or disapproved of their conduct: and the same is the case, at this day, with infidels, and mere nominal Christians. This is an earnest and evidence of a future judgment, when God will judge the secret actions, thoughts, motives and affections of all men, by his Son Jesus Christ; which was one principal doctrine of the gospel, that Paul preached both to Jews and Gentiles. (Marg. Ref. x—z. Notes, Ec. 12:11—14. 1 Cor. 4:3—5. 2 Cor. 5:9—12, v. 10.)—As the apostle plainly says, that "as many as have sinned without law, shall perish without law;" it is surprising, that any expositors should have thought the case of Job and his friends, and Cornelius, to be referred to. Probably Job lived and died before the law; and he had traditional revelation, as the patriarchs had: and Cornelius, though not observant of the ceremonial law, had the scriptures of the Old Testament, and by the grace of God had studied them to good purpose. (Notes, Acts 10:1—8.) It was indisputably the apostle's object, to convince his readers, that neither revelation, nor the light of reason and conscience, could save those who failed of obeying them; that all had in many things failed, however, in particular instances, some had been obedient; and that all must perish, though with different degrees of aggravation, unless saved by the gospel.—"Hell hath no power over sinners of Israel, because Abraham and Isaac descend thither to fetch them thence. ... No circumcised person goes to hell; God having promised to deliver them from it, for the merit of circumcision. ... All Israelites have their portion in the world to come; and that notwithstanding their sins; yea, though they were condemned here for their wickedness." Extracts from Jewish writers in Whilby.—It would not be easy to produce any passage from modern writers, in which proud self-righteousness and rank antinomianism are so completely combined: but a considerable portion of the same heaven, may often be discerned both among papists and protestants.

24 For <sup>p</sup> the name of God is blasphemed among the Gentiles through you, <sup>q</sup> as it is written.

Note.—In order to understand this chapter, it should constantly be kept in mind, that the apostle is combating the prejudices and presumption of the Jews, to whom he expected the epistle would be shown, and whose influence he knew would be employed, to unsettle the minds of the believers at Rome. The Gentiles are therefore introduced, by way of illustrating the argument, and not in order to show in what way they may be justified. (Note, 12—16.)—The apostle here immediately addressed himself to any Jew, who was willing to take up the argument. He supposed him to rest his hope of acceptance on the law, and this with great quietness and satisfaction; and to “boast of God,” as standing in a covenant-relation to him. He thought himself well acquainted with the will of God; and, as an expert casuist, he could “distinguish things which differed,” and give the preference to such as were more excellent, having from his youth been instructed out of the law. (Marg. Ref. a—e.) In this confidence he thought himself qualified to guide and enlighten the blind and benighted pagans; and to instruct such as became proselytes, whom he deemed foolish, and mere babes, compared with himself; as he had got a complete knowledge of the whole law, having the form of it in his memory and mind. This, however, was a mere semblance, and outside appearance of the spiritual knowledge, and true meaning of the law, which, rightly understood, would lead him to trust in the promised and typified Redeemer, and not in the law itself. In this form he rested, without even attempting to obey all the precepts of the law, according to his own exposition; as if his work had been to instruct others, and not himself! or as if he meant to insult the great Lawgiver, by studying his commandments in order to break them! (Marg. Ref. f—i.—Notes, 3:19, 20. 7:7—12. Gal. 2:17—21.) Did such a man explain and enforce the law against theft, and then practise dishonesty? Did he commit adultery, after quoting and explaining the seventh commandment? Did he sacrilegiously embezzle the sacred treasures, or defraud the Lord of his dues, through an idolatrous love of money, after having expressed his abhorrence of idolatry? (Marg. Ref. k—o.) It was notorious, that many of the chief priests, scribes, and elders, who appeared most zealous for the law, were guilty of these and similar crimes: and the rest, who rejected the gospel, and “made their boast in the law,” would be found to dishonor God, by evidently breaking it. For, in fact, the name of God was blasphemed among the Gentiles, and they were set against true religion, by the wickedness of the Jews; as it had been written in their scriptures, and indeed had been a charge brought frequently by the prophets against their fathers. (Marg. Ref. p, q.) The terms here used concerning the Gentiles, aptly expose the arrogant self-wisdom of the Jews.—‘This passage may be illustrated from ‘the Jewish writings: for they say, that he ‘who teacheth others, what he doeth not himself, is like a blind man who hath a candle in ‘his hand to give light to others, whilst he himself doth walk in darkness.’ Jewish writings quoted by Whitby.—Blasphemed, &c. (24) Of this, Josephus doth frequently accuse them, saying, ‘What wickedness do you conceal or ‘hide, which is not known to your enemies? ‘You triumph in your wickedness, strive daily ‘who shall be most vile, making a show of ‘your wickedness, as if it were virtue.’ And ‘thinkest thou this, O man, that thou shalt escape the judgment of God, who punisheth the ‘Gentiles, when thou art as guilty as they of ‘acting against thy conscience, and doing that ‘for which thy own mouth condemns thee; ... ‘and which doth also cause them to “blaspheme ‘that holy name by which thou art called?”’ Whitby. 25 For <sup>r</sup>circumcision verily profiteth, if thou keep the law: <sup>s</sup>but if thou be a breaker of the law, thy circumcision is made uncircumcision.

cision?

27 And shall not uncircumcision which is by nature, <sup>u</sup>if it fulfil the law, <sup>x</sup>judge thee, who <sup>y</sup>by the letter and circumcision dost transgress the law?

28 For <sup>z</sup>he is not a Jew which is one outwardly; <sup>a</sup>neither is that circumcision which is outward in the flesh:

29 But he is a Jew <sup>b</sup>which is one inwardly; <sup>c</sup>and circumcision is that of the heart, <sup>d</sup>in the Spirit, and not in the letter; <sup>e</sup>whose praise is not of men, but of God.

Note.—The Jews, though chargeable with the grossest violations of the moral law, confided in circumcision, as if it had secured their covenant-relation to God. But the apostle showed them, that while circumcision, and the means of grace connected with it, would be very advantageous to the conscientious Jew, who copied the example of Abraham; (Note, 3:1,2.) especially in bringing him acquainted with the oracles of God, and preparing him to receive the gospel; it could not profit the presumptuous transgressor, who rested in it, and neglected that "righteousness by faith" of which it was the seal. (Note, 4:9—12.) If a man cleaved to the law, he must perfectly obey it, in order to justification; circumcision made "him a debtor to fulfil the whole law;" and his transgressions cast him out of the covenant of God, as if he had never been circumcised. (Marg. Ref. r, s.—Note, Gal. 5:1—6.) On the other hand, if an uncircumcised Gentile should regulate his conduct according to the righteousness prescribed by the law; ought he not to be deemed a true worshipper of God, notwithstanding his uncircumcision? Such Gentiles, as were taught by divine grace thus to love and serve God, would, like Cornelius, embrace the gospel when proposed to them; and thus in uncircumcision, the external natural state of man, they, being made partakers of an inward spiritual change, would judge and condemn the Jew, who, having the letter of the law and the outward circumcision, had no inward disposition to obedience. (Marg. Ref. t—x.—Notes, Acts 10:1—8. Gal. 6:11—16. Phil. 3:1—7, v. 3.) For, in fact, that man was not to be counted a Jew, or one of the chosen people of God, who was only so in his outward profession or descent; nor was that the true circumcision, the valid seal of the covenant, "which was outward in the flesh." But he was the real Jew, or child of Abraham, who had the inward disposition of his believing and obedient progenitor; and that was "the true circumcision," which was wrought in the heart by regeneration, according to the spiritual meaning, and not the mere letter, of the law; producing an inward conformity of the judgment and affections to its holy precepts. (Marg. Ref. z—d.—Notes, Gen. 17:9—12. Lev. 26:41,42. Deut. 30:1—10, v. 19. Jer. 9:25,26.) This indeed men could not see, or would not approve and commend, but rather despise and hate; but God would approve, commend, and value it. So that, though the outward seal had been for the time necessary: yet the inward grace, or the thing signified, was always far more excellent: and the former was now superseded by the Christian dispensation, and could be of no use to those who tenaciously adhered to it. (Marg. Ref. e.—Notes, Acts 7:51—53. Gal. 4:8—11,21—31. Heb. 10:26,27. 1 Pet. 3:1—4, v. 4.)

The censures which men pass on their neighbors, who perhaps justly deserve them, may render themselves more inexcusable, while "they do the same things, and yet trust in themselves that they are righteous, and despise others."—The branches of man's disobedience are numerous, yet they all spring from the same root: nor can any one judge another to be deserving of divine wrath, without at the same time condemning himself: for, though he may not have committed exactly the same crimes; yet he has been guilty of the same apostasy from God, and rebellion against him; and is equally chargeable with sinning against his better judgment in various ways. Frequently, superior advantages render a man's apparently lighter offences more aggravated, in the sight of God, than the more scandalous sins of his worse educated neighbor, against which he vehemently declaims. We are indeed very incompetent judges of the comparative heinousness of men's conduct: but it is certain that "the judgment of God is" and will be "according to truth," against all who break his law, and reject his grace. To him we ought to leave others, and to be chiefly concerned to judge ourselves, and to seek mercy according to his blessed gospel, that his truth in fulfilling his promises may secure our salvation.—If our fellow-sinners cannot stand before us in judgment; how shall we, who are guilty of the same things, escape the righteous condemnation of a heart-searching God? In deciding against them we pass sentence on ourselves; and “if our heart condemn us, God is greater than our heart and knoweth all things.” (Notes, Jam. 2:3—13. 1 John 3:18—24, vv. 13—20.)—The excuses, which numbers make for their misconduct, may very commonly be turned against them: nor would men in general be so daringly wicked, were it not for their experience of the Lord’s forbearance, and their general notions of his mercy! (Note, Ec. 8:11—13.) But those who thus “despise the riches of his goodness and forbearance,” and grow more bold in rebellion by that kindness which should “lead them to repentance,” will find at last that they have been “sinning against their own souls;” and that their “hard and impenitent hearts” have led them “to treasure up wrath against the day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment of God.”—Indeed this is the daily employment of every unbeliever; and he adds to his store, with a rapidity of increase, proportioned to his crimes and abused advantages! He himself will certainly reap the harvest which he now sows, and the longer he is spared in the long-suffering of God, the more terrible will be the day of righteous retribution, if he continue to the end in this destructive course. (Notes, Luke 7:40—43. Gal. 6:6—10, vv. 7, 8. 2 Pet. 2:4—9.)

V. 7—16.

The questions concerning justification, personal election, and efficacious grace, should be kept distinct from those, which relate to the character and conduct of the righteous and the wicked. If a man cannot be satisfied with an earthly portion, but aspires after “glory, honor, and immortality;” and if he seeks this inheritance, by faith in the promises of God, and “patient continuance in well doing;” he doubtless is in the way to eternal life. But if men contend against the precepts and sanction of God’s holy law, and his decrees and dispensations, his truths and ordinances, or blame any thing rather than their own sins; if they “do not obey the truth, but obey unrighteousness,” and live in allowed violations of the divine law: no doubt they are in the broad road to destruction; and, proceeding in that path, “indignation and wrath” will overtake them, to whatever church or sect they may belong, or whatever creed they may subscribe. Indeed, “tribulation and anguish” must come upon all impenitent evil-doers: but “glory, honor, and peace” will be awarded to all, “who are taught by the grace of God, to live soberly and righteously, and godly in this present world;” “for there is no respect of persons with God.” (Notes, Tit. 2:11—14.) Whatever may now be objected to this, from some doctrines ill understood, or from appearances in providence which are misinterpreted; it will be made manifest to all the world, in the day when “God shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ;” as he has assured us he will, in his holy gospel. Then those who, not having the written word, have sinned against the dictates of their own consciences, will be proved guilty, and condemned by that rule: those who have sinned against the law of God, which was made known to them, will be judged and punished according to that law: and the professors of the gospel will be shown to have been either true believers or hypocrites, according to the effects produced by the truth on their minds, and hearts, and conduct. (Notes and P. O. Matt. 25:31—46.) For if the very Gentiles were “a law unto themselves” and each other, when they acted contrary to “the work of the law written in their hearts;” how absurd must it be for any man, to expect acceptance with God by a written law, which he hears and disobeys; or by the gospel, when he does not practically believe it! No man can indeed be justified by his own obedience, because all men deviate from their rule: yet the nearer they act in conformity to their principles and convictions, the lighter will be their condemnation; and the greater the distance there is between their known rule, and their allowed practice, the more aggravated must be their guilt; when the secrets of men shall be brought to light, and all these infinitely important concerns shall be determined by the omniscient, most righteous, and yet most merciful Judge.

V. 17—29.

The Jew, who “rested in the law, and made his boast of God,” and was proud of his superior knowledge and attainments, will at the last day be more deeply condemned, than the blind Gentile whom he so greatly disdained: and numbers, ‘who call themselves Christians,’ and have learned many right notions of the gospel as a system, and so deem themselves the children of God, though they “obey not the truth,” will perish more dreadfully than their more ignorant neighbors, who have sinned against less light and inferior advantages. Indeed the sermons which many preach, and the books which they publish, will testify against them; and it behoves ministers especially, to be most awfully jealous over themselves in this respect: for it is far more congenial to the self-flattery of our hearts and our worldly lusts to instruct others, than to bear the yoke ourselves. Many teach their hearers the truth and will of God, who never teach themselves; they lay down good rules, but never practise them: and the discoveries of the great day will show, that some, who appeared to be “the guides of the blind, and the light of such as sat in darkness,” were indeed dishonest men, adulterers, or sacrilegious mercenaries. Numbers despise their ignorant neighbors for resting in a dead “form of godliness,” and yet they themselves trust in “a form of knowledge,” which is equally lifeless and inefficacious: and many glory in the gospel, whose unholy lives dishonor God, and cause his name and truth to be blasphemed among his enemies. In short, no forms, ordinances, or notions can profit us, without regeneration by the Holy Spirit; which will always eventually lead us to seek an interest in “the righteousness of God by faith.” The distinction between truth and error, and between divine institutions and human inventions, is indeed immutable and most important: yet a man may be alive to God, who maintains some errors, cleaves to some superstitions, and forms improper conclusions in respect of some divine appointments: while another, who is very clear in his notions, and exact in externals, may be "dead in sin," "uncircumcised in heart;" and, through the letter and the outward form, he may deceive himself, and be a scandal to the gospel. For he is no more a Christian now, than he was a Jew of old, who is one outwardly; "neither is that baptism, which is outward in the flesh;" but he is the real Christian, who is inwardly a true believer, with an obedient faith; and the true baptism is that of the heart, by "the washing of regeneration and the renewal of the Holy Ghost," producing a spiritual mind, and a cordial subjection to the truth, in its holy import and tendency. A Christian of this character will seldom be much approved by zealots of any party, any more than by the world at large: but he will be accepted of God, and at length welcomed with the praise of God, "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

CHAP. III.

The advantages which the Jews possessed, 1, 2. The unbelief of some does not render the faith of God of no effect, 3, 4; who is just in punishing sin, though he takes occasion from it to display his own glory, 5—8. Passages from the Old Testament adduced to prove that the Jews, as well as others, are "all under sin," 9—19; so that no flesh is justified by the deeds of the law, 20. The "righteousness of God without the law" is "unto all and upon all that believe," without any difference, 21, 22. As all have sinned, whether Jews or Gentiles, all must be justified by the free grace of God, through faith in Christ, and the redemption of his blood, that God may be glorified, and boasting excluded, 23—30. This establishes the law, 31.

Note.—If disobedient Jews could not be accepted, and if obedient Gentiles might be saved; it would be asked, "What advantage has the Jew" above the Gentile? or in what respect does circumcision profit him? (Marg. Ref. a.—Note, 2:25—29.) The whole Old Testament implied, that God had peculiarly favored the posterity of Abraham; and the law, together with the "seal of circumcision," had been supposed to convey some special privileges; and did the apostle mean to level all these distinctions, and to prove that the Jews had no advantage from their relation to Abraham, and their national covenant? To this he replied, that they, as a collective body, had doubtless much benefit from them in every way. (Note, 9:4, 5.) The law and circumcision could not indeed save them in their sins, or by their own efficacy; yet they gave them most important advantages for obtaining salvation. The stated ministry of the priests, the occasional messages of the prophets, the ordinances of the temple, the worship at the synagogues, their education in an acquaintance with the true God, and at a distance from gross idolatry, the many good examples which were set before them, and the dispensations of Providence respecting them, were means of grace, which probably were made effectual to the conversion and salvation of more persons in that one nation, from age to age, than were converted in all the rest of the world. But especially "the oracles of God," the sacred writings of Moses and the prophets, were "committed to them;" and the written word of God had been continued among them through their several generations, to direct them how to seek acceptance with God, and to walk before him. In them the Messiah was promised, and the various particulars of his character, miracles, redemption, and kingdom, were typified and predicted: among the Jews he made his appearance in the appointed time; in him the scriptures were fulfilled before their eyes, and numbers of them had believed in him, and found salvation by him. (Marg. Ref. b—e.)—Oracles, &c. (2) Some think the scriptures are thus called, with reference to the oracular answers, which the high priest delivered, when he consulted the Lord by the breast-plate of judgment; (Note, Ex. 28:30.) implying that they were as immediately and entirely the word of God, as the oracles thus delivered had been.—"This is so remarkable and important a testimony to 'the divine inspiration of the Old Testament in general, that it can leave no doubt concerning 'the full persuasion of St. Paul on this head.' Doddridge.—Committed, &c.] Or, "they were entrusted with the oracles of God."—"The oracles of God were deposited with the Jews, not 'to keep to themselves, but to publish them to 'all the world besides; but because they did not 'this work sufficiently, it is Christ's appointment to the apostles, that they should disperse 'themselves unto all nations, and so bring them 'to the knowledge of his will.' Hammond.—It behoves Christians in every age to remember, that the scriptures are thus committed or entrusted to them also, in order that they may communicate the blessing to all around them, and to all who shall come after them, and to all men, throughout the earth, by every proper means, to the utmost of their ability; and to preserve them uncorrupted and entire, for this purpose. In this latter respect, the Jews have fulfilled their trust, to a degree of exactness, which could never have been previously expected: (Note, Prov. 22:12.) and, while their frivolous and minute exactness, in many things, is apt to excite contempt; their fairness, in preserving the sacred text from intentional alteration, is evident in almost all passages, even where their own rejection of the Messiah appears most criminal. It is the present plan of their Rabbins, to fright the people from reading such portions of the scripture.

Note.—What if some, if even the greater part of the nation of Israel, from worldly and ambitious motives, had obstinately and wickedly rejected this divine Saviour? Did their unbelief render the faithfulness of God ineffectual? He had fulfilled his promises to their fathers; and if they would not receive and submit to the “Seed of Abraham,” and the Son of David, could they plead that God had failed of his word, because he would not continue his special favor to them, notwithstanding their disobedience and atrocious wickedness? (Notes, 17:8—15. Luke 1:46—55,67—75.) “God forbid,” that such a thought should be allowed in any one’s mind! Let the thought be abhorred; let every man rather humbly acknowledge the veracity and faithfulness of God; though it should require him to suppose that all men were liars, hypocrites, or deceivers, as every one in some degree must be allowed to be. (Marg. Ref. f—k.—Note, Ps. 62:8—10.) Let the blame of the rejection of the Messiah rest on them, and their hypocrisy, and not be supposed to reflect upon the faithfulness of God: even as David, when he had committed grievous offences, acknowledged that God was, by his crimes, “justified” in his declarations concerning the desperate wickedness of the human heart: and that the humiliating event was permitted, to display more clearly the truth, justice, and mercy of God; and that he might be fully vindicated from all those presumptuous charges, by which men venture to arraign the testimonies of his word, the threatenings of his law, or the dispensations of his providence. (Marg. Ref. l.—Note, Ps. 51:4.) The quotation is exactly from the LXX.

6 <sup>q</sup> God forbid: <sup>r</sup> for then how shall God judge the world?

7 For <sup>s</sup> if the truth of God hath more abounded through my lie unto his glory; <sup>t</sup> why yet am I also judged as a sinner?

8 And not rather, (as <sup>u</sup> we be slanderously reported, and as some affirm that we say,) <sup>x</sup> Let us do evil, that good may come? whose damnation is just.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—To the foregoing conclusion of the apostle, the Jews or other cavillers might reply, that if “their unrighteousness” gave occasion to the more illustrious manifestation of the divine justice, or rather to the showing more evidently the necessity and excellency of “the righteousness of God” for man’s justification; would he not be unrighteous, if he took vengeance on them, for those actions which eventually occasioned the more conspicuous display of his glory? (Marg. Ref. m—o.—Note, 5:20, 21.) This objection the apostle adduced “as a man,” an unbeliever, who purposed to justify himself, and find fault with the sentence of God against him. (Marg. Ref. p.—Note, 9:19—21.)—In fact, the wickedness and obstinate unbelief of the Jews fully proved the need, which all men have of “the righteousness of God by faith;” and also his justice, in punishing them for their sins, and in the sentence of the law against all transgressors: and thus in every sense it “commended his righteousness.” Yet the thought, that it would be unjust in him to take vengeance on them, ought to be rejected with abhorrence: for, if he could not justly punish those crimes which made way for the display of his glory, how could he judge the world? (Marg. Ref. r.—Note, Gen. 18:23—26.) In that case he never could inflict vengeance on any criminal: for he will take occasion, from the rebellion of all fallen creatures, however distinguished, to display his own glorious perfections to the greater advantage; though the intention of transgressors, and the natural tendency of their conduct, are diametrically contrary to both. So that this proves still more fully the malignity of sin, as committed against a Being of such infinite wisdom, power, and perfection, that he effects good to his creation, and glory to himself, by occasion of those very actions, which naturally tend to the destruction of his creatures, and the dishonor of his name. (Notes, Gen. 50:20. Is. 10:5—14. 55:8,9. Eph. 3:9—12.)—This objection might for substance be stated in another way: “Suppose the truth of God, in his predictions, promises, or denunciations, should be more abundantly manifested to his glory, by any man’s telling a wilful lie: why should the liar be punished for giving occasion to the display of God’s glory?” Yet every one must see, that the lie thus told was directly contrary to the truth of God, and merely the occasion of displaying it: and the event could not deduct from the malignity of the lie. (Marg. Ref. s, t.—Notes, Gen. 12:11—16. 27:6—29.) If it were in any case admitted, that a violation of the law of God ceased to be criminal, because his glory was eventually promoted by it; then the slanderous report, circulated concerning the Christians by those who, misunderstanding the doctrine of salvation by grace, affirmed that they said, “Let us do evil, that good may come,” would indeed be established as a general principle; and as the rule of man’s conduct, instead of the holy and perfect law of God. But, in fact, the condemnation of those who thus perverted the gospel, or who committed sin that good might come from it, was most righteous. The blame of their sins belonged only to themselves; the honor of the good done by occasion of them, to God alone. (Marg. Ref. u, x.)—Different opinions indeed are advanced concerning the persons, of whom the apostle said, “whose damnation is just.” Some interpret it of the Jews and others who reject the gospel: but this proposition, though true, seems not to rise out of the context, or belong to the argument. Others apply the awful sentence to the calumniators, who charged the Christians with saying, “Let us do evil that good may come:” but the clause, “as we be slanderously reported, &c.” is, I think properly, included in a parenthesis, that it may not interrupt the main subject. The apostle evidently intended to show that God may justly, and will certainly, punish those sins, which yet eventually prove the occasion of more conspicuously manifesting his glory. Now, if this were not the case, it might be said, “Let us do evil that good may come:” but on the contrary, whatever blasphemers may assert, this proposition is so contrary to the real nature and genius of the gospel, that every intelligent minister or Christian will be forward to allow the condemnation of those, who thus encourage themselves in sin, under a vain imagination that good will follow, to be undeniably righteous. (Note, 6:1, 2.) The floodgates of licentiousness are opened by such a view of the gospel.—Yet even apparently religious persons often tolerate, nay, zealously promote, practices which cannot be denied to be deviations from truth and integrity, and vindicate them, because good is thus done. In this way, however, the standard of integrity is (dreadful to say!) fixed lower, in some particulars, among numbers who are zealous for the gospel, than among respectable worldly people; who are, by noticing these things, exceedingly prejudiced against evangelical truth.—Nay, the same false principle is brought forward, in another and more fashionable form, when utility, and not “the law of God,” is made the standard of morality, and a main principle of reasonings on moral obligation. It is, on these accounts, most obvious to suppose, that the apostle meant, though in a cursory manner, to bear a most decisive testimony against a maxim, which, carried to its consequences, is destructive of all practical religion; and against those who, professing Christianity, countenanced and acted according to it.

9 ¶ What then? <sup>z</sup> are we better than they? No, in no wise; for we have before * proved both Jews and Gentiles, <sup>a</sup> that they are all under sin;

18 There is <sup>q</sup> no fear of God before their eyes.

Note.—The apostle here resumes his subject from the second verse. The advantages of the Jews were many: (Note, 1,2.) but were they “better” than the Gentiles, or more able to justify themselves before God by their own works, or without “the righteousness of faith?” No, in “no wise;” for “we have before lodged the indictment against both Jews and Gentiles, that they are all under sin.” (Marg. and Marg. Ref. y—a.—Notes, 1:18—32. 2:) They had all, in manifold instances, violated the known rule of their conduct, and were under condemnation as transgressors, unless delivered by the mercy and grace of God according to the gospel. To this indictment, on which the Gentiles had been convicted, the Jews pleaded, “Not guilty:” and therefore, besides the evidence already brought against them from notorious facts, and the nature of the case, the apostle produced several passages of the scriptures against them. In these, it was not intimated that circumcision, the written law, the ceremonial observances, or the national covenant, would excuse their crimes, or entitle them to the favor of God; as the unbelieving Jews vainly imagined. And if these charges were true of the greater part of the nation in former times; could it be supposed, that the Jews, when the apostle wrote, were better by nature, or merely as circumcised, or as having the law, than their fore-fathers had been? It was expressly written of them, that in themselves, and by their works, there was not one of them righteous: that there were none of them, who understood the character, truth, and will of God, or their own interest and duty; or who earnestly sought to know him, and find happiness in his favor: they had all forsaken the way of holy obedience, they were all become unprofitable, in respect of the great end of their creation, and their peculiar advantages; so that none of them employed themselves in glorifying God, and doing good to man. (Marg. Ref. b-i.—Notes, Ps. 14:1-3.) Their throats, by their insatiable luxury, or rather by their filthy communications, resembled the sepulchre when opened to receive the dead, or when emitting its nauseous and infectious vapors. (Marg. Ref. k.—Note, Ps. 5:9.) Deceit and dissimulation seemed the chief use of their tongues; their slanders, seductions, and flatteries were under their lips, as the fatal “poison of asps:” instead of pious and kind words, their mouths were filled with imprecations, perjuries, and bitter revilings. (Marg. Ref. l-n.—Notes, Ps. 10:2-11. 140:3.) They were eager to shed blood, in revenge, ambition, or avarice: (Notes, Prov. 1:10-14. Is. 59:3-8.) they knew not the ways, in which godly men walk at peace with God and their neighbors; and therefore they went on in those paths, which lead to misery and ruin, both to themselves and each other. (Marg. Ref. p.) In short they had cast the fear of God behind their backs, and habitually disregarded his authority, threatenings, precepts, and judgments. (Marg. Ref. q.—Note, Ps. 36:1.)—A few exceptions, by the mercy and grace of God, there doubtless were to these general rules; and the apostle intended very soon to show how these persons were made to differ: but these quotations were full to the point, to show the Jews, that they were as unable to justify themselves before God as the Gentiles were. For if, in the days of David and Isaiah, this had been the general character of the people; the acceptance, and holiness, of any among them, must arise from some other cause, than their national covenant and external privileges.—Most of these texts are quoted nearly from the Septuagint, without material alteration. They are indeed all, except the first clause, found together in many editions of the Septuagint in the fourteenth Psalm, and exactly as quoted by the apostle. (Note, Ps. 14:2,3.) But it is more likely, that some transcriber inserted the passage from this epistle, than that the arrangement was made by the Greek translators themselves.

19 Now we know that what things soever the law saith, it saith to them who are under the law; and that every mouth may be stopped, and all the world may become guilty before God.

20 Therefore by the deeds of the law, there shall no flesh be justified in his sight: for by the law is the knowledge of sin.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—It was well known, that the things which were written in the law (or in the Old Testament,) were immediately addressed to those “who were under the law,” and had the benefit of divine revelation; or to the nation of Israel, and not to the Gentiles. (Marg. Ref. r.—Note, 2:12-16.) This was intended to silence the objections of the Jews, who broke the law in which they rested; and indeed in this manner “every mouth must be stopped,” and “all the world must become,” or be proved, “guilty before God:” as it was not supposed that the Gentiles were more free from guilt, than his peculiar people Israel. So that, in fact, every sinner’s plea must be silenced; either in this life as a humble penitent before God’s mercy-seat, or as a condemned criminal before his judgment-seat. (Marg. Ref. s, t.) From these premises it evidently followed, that no one of the whole fallen race could be justified before God, by his own obedience to the law: for by the law sin is discovered, exposed, and condemned. The straightness of that perfect rule detects and makes known the crookedness of men’s dispositions and actions; and it must therefore convict the transgressor as guilty, instead of pronouncing him not guilty, or a righteous person. (Marg. Ref. u-z.)—Every attentive reader must observe, that the apostle uses the word “law” in various meanings; which is rather to be considered as the defect of human language, than the result of ambiguity in his style. But the context generally shows how the word is to be understood: and common sense, united with a teachable spirit, will usually determine this far better than critical learning; which is too often employed to perplex what is plain, rather than to clear up what is obscure. The nature of the argument requires us to suppose, that the apostle means the sacred scriptures in general, when he says, “Whatsoever the law saith:” for the quotations are not from the law of Moses, and it is evident the whole Old Testament was thus spoken of. (Note, John 10:32—39, v. 31.) When he spoke of the Jews, as “under the law,” he evidently meant the whole legal dispensation, by which they were distinguished from the Gentiles. But when he says, “by the law is the knowledge of sin,” he must be understood of the moral law especially, the extent, spirituality, and excellency of which shows what things are sinful, and how evil sin is: whereas the ceremonial law rather gave the knowledge of salvation, by prefiguring the shedding of that atoning blood, and the communication of that sanctifying grace, by which sin is taken away. (Notes, 7:7—12. John 1:17. 2 Cor. 3:7—11. Gal. 2:17—21, v. 19.)—Indeed this subject seems capable of an easy solution. If there be any law, which a man has perfectly kept, he may doubtless be justified by it: and surely no man can be justified by a law, which condemns him for breaking it! But, there is no law of God, which any man has kept; therefore no law by the deeds of which a man can be justified. The Gentile broke the law of his reason and conscience; the Jew broke the moral law; and even the attempt to justify himself by observing the ceremonial law, contradicted the very nature and intent of it. And as to that ‘new law,’ which requires sincere obedience as the condition of justification; those, who dream of it should show us when it was promulgated, where it may be found, what it requires, whom it can condemn, or whom it can justify. When this is done, it may be worth while to prove, that it “makes void” both the law and the gospel; that it introduces a new, vague, and unintelligible rule of duty, which every man may interpret according to his own inclinations; that it introduces boasting, and unites together pharisaical pride and antinomian licentiousness. (Note, 29—31.) Yet this vague unscriptural notion, which is replete with such complicated absurdities, so well suits men’s natural indolence of thought, in matters of religion; serves so conveniently to reconcile a quiet conscience with a worldly life; and so coincides with their enmity against both the holiness of the law, and the humiliating doctrines of the gospel; that perhaps it deceives more souls, than all other false systems of religion put together, in this superficial dissipated age.—“By law, which is the publishing of the rule with a penalty, we are not delivered from the power of sin, nor can it help men to righteousness; but by law we come experimentally to know sin, in the power and force of it, since we find it prevail upon us, notwithstanding the punishment of death is annexed to it.” Locke.—“The knowledge of sin, being chiefly by the moral law, (7:7.) shows, that the apostle excludes that, as well as the ceremonial law, from justification: and evident it is, that the antithesis runs all along, not between moral and ceremonial works; but between works in general,

‘and faith. (20, 22, 27. 4:2, 6. 9:32. 10:5, 6.)’ Whitby.—“No flesh,” means none born of fallen Adam’s race. (1—4, 9. John 3:6. Notes, 21—26. Ps. 143:2.)

22 Even the righteousness of God, <sup>d</sup> which is by faith of Jesus Christ, <sup>e</sup> unto all <sup>f</sup> and upon all them that believe: <sup>g</sup> for there is no difference;

Note.—The apostle, having “shut up all men under sin,” (Note, Gal. 3:19—22, v. 22.) proceeds more explicitly to exhibit “the righteousness of God by faith,” (Note, 1:17.) which had been manifestly declared by the preaching of the gospel. This is the righteousness, which God had appointed, provided, and introduced, in the Person of his Son. It was “without the law;” having no dependence on any man’s personal obedience to the law, being entirely a distinct thing: no past obedience being in the least taken notice of as having any influence in the sinner’s justification; and his subsequent obedience being intended for other purposes. It had nothing to do with the ceremonial law, except as it was the substance of some of its shadows: for the Jew, who accepted of this righteousness, would place no dependence on these externals; and the Gentile convert was not required to be circumcised, or to keep that law. Yet it had been “witnessed by the law and the prophets:” the ceremonies typified it; the very strictness of the moral law and its awful curses, being compared with the promises of mercy to sacrifice was offered, this righteousness intro-sinner, implied it; the promises and predictions of the Messiah bore witness to it; the faith and hope of ancient believers recognized it; and the whole Old Testament, rightly understood, taught men to expect and depend on it. (Marg. Ref. a-c.) This "righteousness of God by faith in Jesus" is accounted, or imputed, to all believers without exception: yea, it is "put on them" as a robe: for the words "unto all and upon all," seem incapable of any other consistent construction. (Marg. Ref. d-f. Notes, 4:4-8. Is. 45:23-25. Jer. 23:5; 6. Dan. 9:24. 1 Cor. 1:26-31. 2 Cor. 5:18-21, v. 21. Gal. 3:26-29. Phil. 3:8-11, vv. 8, 9. 2 Pet. 1:1,2.) Nor is there, in this respect, any difference between one and another, however otherwise distinguished; as "all have sinned, and come short" of rendering to God the glory due unto him, all have lost his glorious image, and all have forfeited that glorious felicity, which was annexed to perfect obedience as its reward. (Marg. Ref. g-k. Notes, 5:1,2. Ps. 73:23-28, v. 24. 1 Pet. 5:10,11.) Therefore, whatever the nature or degree of men's crimes may have been, or whatever their nation, rank, or capacities, "there is no difference," as to the way in which they must be justified before God. Every believer is not only pardoned, but honorably acquitted, as one against whom no charge can be supported; and "accounted righteous," or entitled to the reward of righteousness. (Notes, 4:6-8. 8:32-34.) This is by the free gift of God, which he bestows on the believer, wholly from his own infinite grace and mercy; not only without his deserving it, but directly contrary to his deserts, which the apparent tautology, "freely, by his grace," seems to denote. This grace is honorably exercised, "through the redemption that is in Jesus Christ," or through the ransom and meritorious obedience unto death, of the incarnate Son of God, as our Surety: for God the Father had before set him forth to be a propitiatory sacrifice; he had appointed him to be Mediator, as "God manifested in the flesh," for that purpose; he had openly "laid on him the iniquities of us all," and exacted the punishment from him; and he had exhibited this transaction to the world by the gospel, that through him sinners of every nation might approach God, on a propitiatory, or mercy-seat, and find acceptance by faith in the Saviour's atoning blood. (Marg. Ref. l-o.) This method was taken, in order "to declare" and manifest the perfect righteousness of God; even in the very act of pardoning the innumerable sins of believers, remitting the punishment due to them, and accounting those righteous who in themselves were not so. Indeed, whatever the Jews might suppose, this was as necessary in respect of their believing progenitors, as any other sinners. For, in remitting the punishment, justly merited by the sins committed in times past "through his forbearance," God was not propitiated in any degree by the repentance or subsequent good works of his servants, which could not satisfy his justice; nor did he ultimately regard the legal sacrifices, which "could not take away sin;" but he had dealt with them as looking forward to the engagements of the divine Surety of the new covenant, and the atonement which he was at length to make. In the fulness of time, therefore, this sacrifice was offered, this righteousness introduced, and this method of justification published to mankind; that God might be clearly known to be a just and righteous Governor, and yet "the Justifier" of every one "who believed in Jesus;" which he could not otherwise have been. (Marg. Ref. p-r. Notes, Prov. 17:15. 24:24,25.) For justice in a governor requires, that every man be dealt with according to his real character and actions; except some expedient can be adopted, for maintaining the authority of the law, and the credit of the administration; and to indemnify individuals, while mercy is exercised to those who deserve punishment. So that ancient believers had been admitted to the reward of righteousness, as well as exempted from the punishment deserved by their sins, for the sake of that promised Redeemer, who had engaged to pay their ransom, and bring in an infinitely valuable and everlasting righteousness for their justification; nor would it otherwise have consisted with the infinite justice of God, to have dealt with them in a manner, so very different from their real deservings, nay, contrary to them. (Notes, Heb. 11:1-16,39,40.) This is evidently the apostle's argument; and the concluding verses might be thus translated: "Whom God hath before appointed to be a propitiation, through faith in his blood, for a demonstration of his justice, on account of the passing by of sins, that had been committed in former times, through the forbearance of God: I say, for a demonstration of his justice, in this present time, in order that he might be just, and the Justifier of him that believeth in Jesus."—"Dr. Hammond saith the word δικαιοσύνη is here to be rendered clement and merciful, and that it is commonly taken in that notion, and seldom in that of vindictive justice: but in opposition to this I assert, that the word δικαιοσύνη is used about eighty times in the New Testament, and 'not once in that sense of clemency and mercy. ... He himself produces but one place, (Matt. 1:19.) where, says Dr. Lightfoot, men torment the word δικαιοσύνη to make it signify clement and merciful, when it bears clearly the ordinary sense. Joseph being a just man, would not cohabit with an adulteress: and yet not being willing to make her a public example, and no necessity ... lying upon him so to do, he was minded to put her away privily. ... That he might appear to be just, in requiring this satisfaction for our sins.' Whitby.—Too strong a protest cannot be entered, against this practice of giving a new meaning to words, in scripture, in order to get rid of a conclusion, against which the writer happens to be prejudiced: it is absolutely adding to, or taking from, or changing the word of God; (Note, Rev. 22:18-21.) and it perplexes the minds of ordinary readers to such a degree, that the plainest passages seem to them obscure, and of doubtful meaning.

Note.—The Jews were disposed to boast, as if they had been superior, in nature and excellency, to the Gentiles; instead of considering themselves more highly and undeservedly favored by God. (Note, 2:17—24.) But what reason had they for glorying, seeing even their pious ancestors had been justified by grace, through faith, for the sake of the promised Redeemer and his propitiation? And the apostle decides, that all boasting by any of the human race is excluded, and can have no admission, in consistency with truth and justice. It was indeed the avowed purpose of God, that boasting should be shut out, as the rival of his glory; but “by what law,” or rule of judgment, could this be effected? Was it to be done by “the law of works,” or the method of justifying men on the condition of their own obedience? This could never answer the end, if it were practicable for any to be thus justified; nay, this would introduce and sanction the boasting of one over another, in the things of God. Boasting must therefore be excluded, “by the law of faith;” not by a remedial law, as some call it, (which in fact is “a law of works,” and introduces boasting;) but by justifying believers, entirely by the grace of God through the righteousness and redemption of Christ, without any respect to their works, by faith alone of his own gift and operation; (Marg. Ref. s—u.—Notes, 1 Cor. 1:26—31. Eph. 2:4—10.) not considered, in this matter, as an act of obedience, or a good work, or as the principle of subsequent obedience; (Notes, Gal. 5:1—6.) but as forming the relation between Christ and the sinner; which renders it proper, that the believer should be pardoned and justified for the sake of the Saviour; and that the unbeliever, who is not thus united or related to him, should remain under condemnation. This is “the law of faith,” or the rule of the divine conduct towards believers and unbelievers; and as God has determined, that “no flesh shall glory in his presence;” so on this ground also, the apostle concluded, that “a man is justified by faith, and not by the deeds of the law.” (Marg.

29 Is he <sup>y</sup> the God of the Jews only? Is he not also of the Gentiles? Yes, of the Gentiles also:

30 Seeing it is <sup>z</sup> one God, which shall justify the circumcision by faith, and uncircumcision through faith.

31 Do <sup>a</sup> we then make void the law through faith? <sup>b</sup> God forbid: yea, <sup>c</sup> we establish the law.

Note.—Could any man suppose, that the great Creator of all was the God of the Jews only? Was he not also the God of the Gentiles? Being the Proprietor, Governor, and Benefactor of the whole earth; when all men had alike apostatized from him, it was meet, that in revealing a way for their recovery and reconciliation, he should suit it to the general case of all the nations; though special reasons might require a temporary restriction of it: for his object would be to receive worship from his creatures, in different parts of the world, and to become their Father and Portion. (Marg. Ref. y.) In fact, he was “the God of the Gentiles;” as well as of the Jews; nor were even external privileges to be restricted to the Jews any longer: seeing the same one, living, and true God, who had formerly justified, and did at that time justify those of the circumcision who believed, by faith, and not by their legal services, and left unbelievers under condemnation; was ready, with equal regard, to justify uncircumcised Gentiles, through faith in Christ, when they were brought thus to receive him. (Marg. Ref. z.—Note, Gal. 2:11—16.) And if any should object, that this doctrine of “faith made void the law,” as if it had been given in vain; the apostle absolutely denied the charge, and would by no means have a thought of this kind to be allowed of. On the contrary, he strongly maintains, that this fully “establishes the law” in all its honor and authority; neither abrogating it, nor disgracing it, nor altering it to a nearer level with man’s present state and abilities. (Note, Ps. 119:126.)—The doctrine of faith indeed honors and fulfils the ceremonial law; and showed the proper intent of it, and of the legal dispensation: but then, this was only in order to the final abrogation of them. But the moral law was fully established in honor and authority, both in respect of its precepts and sanction, by the perfect obedience and propitiatory sufferings of the incarnate Son of God: so that its immutable obligation, excellency, and equity, could not have been so fully shown, either by the perfect obedience of the whole human species, or by the destruction of every transgressor. Nor is any man justified by faith in Christ, who does not condemn himself, as justly deserving the wrath of God, for breaking his holy law. Moreover, it is given into the hands of every believer, as his rule of grateful obedience, by which he is to regulate his temper and conduct, and examine all his actions; that in every thing, in which he deviates from this perfect standard, he may repent, and seek forgiveness through the blood of Christ. Yea, it is written in his heart, by the regeneration of the Holy Spirit; (Notes, Jer. 31:31—34. Heb. 8:7—13.) and the believer's love to it, and delight in obeying it, are the evidences of his justification. (Notes, Jam. 2:14—26.) So that the doctrine of faith in every way magnifies and establishes the just, holy, good, and spiritual law of God, in all its honor and authority; while all other schemes of justification disgrace it, or weaken its authority and obligation, as if its precepts were unreasonably strict, and its penalty unrighteously severe; so that God would not be just, if he dealt with men according to it. We therefore know what the apostle's doctrine was: because we know what doctrine is objected to, as "making void the law;" what doctrine is perverted by hypocrites and antinomians, as loosening man's obligation to holy practice; and what doctrine, when duly understood and truly believed, "establishes the law" in the completest manner, and gives the most efficacious motives to all holy obedience.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

We ought always to distinguish between our advantages, and our deservings; and between the means of becoming accepted and holy, and that grace which teaches to profit by those means.—It is a favor of inestimable value to have "the oracles of God" transmitted to us: yet numbers, who are thus distinguished, continue in unbelief to their deeper condemnation. (Notes, Luke 12:47,48. John 3:19—21.)—As the promises of God are made to believers alone; the unbelief of some or many professed Christians, cannot make "the faithfulness of God of none effect:" for he will fulfil his promises to his people, and execute his threatened vengeance on hypocrites and apostates. But, while pride and enmity, "charge God foolishly," humble faith says, "God forbid! let God be true and every man a liar:" and the believer will give him credit for his truth and justice, even where his dispensations are enveloped in clouds and darkness. Indeed, the humble Christian readily decides against every man's pretensions or opinions, when they reflect on the veracity, or militate against the word, of God: knowing that every man is fallible, deceitful, and unholy; but that the Lord can neither mistake, nor deceive, nor be deceived; and that he will be justified from every charge, and will overcome in every contest, or controversy, which his rebellious creatures may presume to enter into with him. The nature and desert of sin, and the motives and purposes of the sinner, remain precisely the same; when the only wise God has taken occasion from them to manifest more conspicuously his own glory: and his justice also will be glorified in punishing the transgressors.—It has often been "slandrously reported" of Christians, that they say, "Let us do evil, that good may come;" and "Let us sin on, that grace may be glorified:" but, if we be true believers, we know that duty belongs to us, and events to God; and that we must not commit any sin, or speak one falsehood, on the hope, or even the assurance, that God would glorify himself by means of it. But, if any habitually speak and act in another manner, without all doubt "their damnation will be just;" and those who love the truth of the gospel, should be extremely careful to avoid all appearances, which may give plausibility to such disgraceful slanders against our holy religion.

Let us remember, that many and great as our advantages are, we are no better in the sight of God than benighted heathens, if not worse; except grace have made us to differ; and then to grace the whole praise is due: for it is proved, beyond contradiction, that we are all, in ourselves, "under sin." (Notes, Eph. 2:1,2. Tit. 3:4—7.)—The scriptures adduced in these verses, too exactly describe the bulk of nominal Christians: their want of conformity to the law of God, and of understanding in the great concerns of religion, and their indisposition to seek with earnestness and decision after his favor and image: their unprofitableness, and working of mischief, instead of doing good; their filthy, profane, dissembling, slanderous, boasting, and flattering words; their oaths, perjuries, curses, and bitter revilings; their revenge, murders, duels, fightings, and delight in war; their mischievous and destructive courses, and their ignorance of the way of peace and holiness, too evidently prove, that "there is no fear of God before their eyes." So that he, who examines the state of society, even in this Christian country; nay, he who inquires seriously into the disposition of his own heart, and the tenor of his past and present life, comparing them with the holy law of God; will easily perceive, that his mouth, and "every mouth must be stopped, and all the world must be brought in guilty before God." How plain then is it to common sense, that "by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified before God!"

V. 21—31.

Blessed be the Lord, that he has not left our fallen race "shut up under sin," without hope or help. For "now the righteousness of God without the law is manifested:" and those alone are truly wise, who plead guilty at his mercy-seat; and seek "that righteousness of God by faith in Jesus Christ, which is unto all and upon all that believe," without any difference. Proud men will be offended at this, and strive to establish some distinction, between themselves and more scandalous or vulgar sinners: but they labor in vain; for "all have sinned and come short of the glory of God;" and the meanest and most guilty of the human species, who comes in God's appointed and manifested way, shall be "justified freely by his grace through the redemption" of his Son: while all, who persist in the attempt of justifying themselves, will assuredly perish under the wrath of God. (Note, 10:1-4.) This is a plan equally suited to glorify the justice, holiness, and mercy of our God; and to give encouragement to the broken-hearted self-condemned criminal. Thus all they, who of old "obtained a good report," found righteousness and salvation: thus the believer's felicity is secured, "boasting is excluded," despair obviated, and the Lord shown to be the God of all nations, with equal regard; making no other distinction in his final decision, than that which subsists between believers and unbelievers. And, whatever Pharisees, Sadducees, or infidels may object; whatever Antinomians, or Enthusiasts may plead, or profess; the doctrine of faith establishes the law in its real honor, and lays the true foundation for all holy obedience; and this doctrine alone "establishes the law."

CHAP. IV.

Justification by faith proved, from the example of Abraham; and the words of David, 1-2. Abraham was justified before circumcision, (which was "the seal of the righteousness of faith," that he might be the father of all believers, whether circumcised or not, 9-12. The promise was not given to him through the law, else it had been void; but, being "of faith by grace," it is sure to all his spiritual seed, in every age and nation, 13-17. The nature and strength of that faith, by which he was justified, 18-22. This was recorded, not for his sake only, but to show that all who believe in Christ, as crucified and risen, are justified in like manner, 23-25.

3 For <sup>g</sup> what saith the scripture? <sup>h</sup> Abraham believed God, and it was <sup>i</sup> counted unto him for righteousness.

Note.—The apostle had generally stated, that the mercy shown to believers of old was vouchsafed with reference to the righteousness and redemption of Christ; (Note, 3:21-26, vv. 25, 26.) but he here proceeds to show this more especially, in respect of Abraham, the most renowned progenitor of Israel.—From 'this single example of Abraham, as deservedly selected from among all the fathers, the apostle intended to draw a conclusion, which would necessarily take in all believers. And that he might do this fairly, he intimates, at the very entrance of the question, that he did not propose Abraham merely as one of the number of believers, but as the father of the church; that he might properly reason from the father to his children, the foundation of which he lays in the thirteenth verse. ... In whatever way Abraham, the father of believers was justified, in the same must all his children (that is, all believers,) be justified: but Abraham was not justified, and made the father of the 'faithful, by any of his own works, either preceding or following his faith in Christ, as promised to him; but merely by faith in Christ, or the merit of Christ by faith imputed to him for righteousness. Therefore all his children become his children, and are justified, not by their works, either preceding or following their faith; but by faith alone in the same Christ, who was at length to come; ... and thus they are at present justified, and shall be to the end of the world.' Beza.—The original seems to connect the words, "according to the flesh," with the verb "found." "What shall we say, that Abraham, our father, hath found according to the flesh?" and some would explain it exclusively of his circumcision. 'By virtue of his obedience to God's command, in circumcising his foreskin. (1 Cor. 10:18. ... 2 Cor. 5:16. ... 11:18. ... Phil. 3:3,4.)—In this the Jews had the greatest confidence of being acceptable to God, ... declaring that no circumcised Jews go to hell.' Whitby.—The apostle had doubtless respect to these arrogant prejudices of his countrymen, in this argument: but if circumcision exclusively had been intended; he would scarcely have allowed, that Abraham might have had whereof to glory, if he had been justified by his obedience in that single instance, and not by his faith. It may, therefore, be concluded, that all those formal and proud works, however distinguished, by which men "born of the flesh," but not "of the Spirit," in every age, seek justification before God, were intended, by the words "according to the flesh." (Marg. Ref. a-f.—Notes, John 3:6. 2 Cor. 11:16-23. Phil. 3:1-7. 1 Pet. 2:23-25.) Did Abraham find righteousness, or justification, in this way? Surely not: why then should any man, who allows this, seek to be justified by such works?—As all really good works are "the fruits of the Spirit," and none else are called "good works" in scripture, at least in the New Testament: and as it is especially the office of the Holy Spirit, to convince men of sin, and to glorify Christ: it may be indisputably inferred, that "the fruits of the Spirit" are never expressly and allowedly depended on for justification. (Notes, John 16:8-11. Gal. 5:1-6, 22-26. Eph. 2:4-10.)—Yet, even the proposition, 'Good works are the fruits of faith, and follow after faith,' in Christ; though a general truth, may admit of some exception, in such cases as that of Cornelius. (Note, Acts 10:1, 2.)—'This interrogation, being not formally answered, must be taken as an answer to itself: "What do we say? that Abraham found according to the flesh?" No, certainly he did not.' Hammond.—No Jew would deny, that Abraham was at least one of the most eminent servants of God, mentioned in scripture: if therefore any of them had been justified by works, it might be supposed that he belonged to that company. And if this had indeed been the case, he would have had some ground of glorying above others, which was contrary to the doctrine before taught: (Note, 3:27, 28.) but, in fact, however distinguished he had been in various respects, he had really nothing to boast of in the presence of God, being a sinner saved by grace, through faith, even as other men. For, not to argue from the years which had preceded his calling, the original source of his being made to differ from his former neighbors, or the failures in his subsequent obedience, and even in his faith; (Notes, Gen. 12:11—16. 20:1—6,9—13. Josh. 24:2.) it was evident from express scripture, that "he believed God, and it was counted to him for righteousness." (Marg. Ref. g—i.—Note, Gen. 15:5,6.) The promise of God, his perfections as engaged to perform it, and the promised Seed through whom the blessings were bestowed, were the objects of his faith: this formed his relation to the Messiah, and interested him in the righteousness which the Messiah had engaged to perform; and therefore his faith was imputed to him for righteousness, as he thus received, and was made partaker of that "righteousness of God, which is, by faith of Jesus Christ, unto all and upon all that believe:" (Note, 3:21—26, v. 22.) so that he was accepted, and dealt with, as if he had personally satisfied divine justice, and perfectly answered all the demands of God's holy law. But, if Abraham, though highly distinguished among men, had no ground of glorying before God; much less had his posterity any ground of glorying in him as their father, while they refused to walk in his steps.—Thus the apostle, by this single example, struck at the very root of their national vain confidence, in Abraham as their father, in circumcision, and in the law of Moses. 4 Now <sup>k</sup> to him that worketh is the reward not reckoned of grace, but of debt.

Note.—From the example of Abraham, the apostle observed, that "to him" (if there were any such among men,) who "worked" the full measure required by the law, the reward must be adjudged, as a debt due to him by the terms of that covenant; (Marg. Ref. k.—Note, Luke 10:25—29.) whereas it was obvious, that it was adjudged to Abraham of grace, as unmerited, seeing "his faith was imputed to him for righteousness:" and this was the universal case of believers. For "to him who worketh not, but," conscious that he can advance no claim of this kind to the desired reward, comes as a sinner, and "believeth on him who justifieth the un-godly, his faith is counted for righteousness." (Marg. Ref. l—n.) This imputation of faith is not because of its own excellency, or worthiness as a good work; but as it refers the Sovereign Judge for payment to the accepted righteousness and atonement of his Son: even as the receipt of a scrap of paper, intrinsically not worth a farthing, in the form of a draft upon a creditable banker, is entered in the merchant's book, for a considerable sum of money, as if it had been paid in cash. The man, "who worketh not," will indeed diligently use appointed means of grace, earnestly and perseveringly repent, forsake sin with decision, and conscientiously perform his several duties, and even become "zealous of good works:" yet he "worketh not" at all, with an aim or expectation of obtaining righteousness in this way, which he knows to be absolutely impossible. He comes to God, as "the Justifier of the ungodly," that he may obtain "the gift of righteousness by faith," of free grace, through the merits of the divine Surety. He is not indeed absolutely "ungodly" at the time of his justification; for his humiliation, submission, and faith, are effects of regeneration; which is the source of all "godliness" in a fallen creature. Yet he is justified, as "ungodly" in himself, in strict justice, and according to the law: he comes for the blessing as "ungodly:" God makes no account of any thing in justifying him, except his faith as forming his relation to Christ; and the man has no respect to any thing else himself, in expecting that blessing. Nay, the justified believer, whatever his holiness or diligence may be, never works for this purpose; and he still comes before God as "ungodly," in this respect, still depending on "the righteousness of God by faith in Christ," as his only hope; though his good works are evidences of the sincerity of his faith. (Note, Phil. 3:8—11.)—Abraham several years before, "by faith, obeyed" the call and command of God; and therefore could not be, strictly speaking, altogether "ungodly," when it was said, "He believed God, and it was counted to him for righteousness:" so that the example of Abraham is a full and clear refutation of the construction, which some put on this text, that men are, altogether and in every sense, ungodly and unregenerate, at the time when God justifies them; a most obnoxious sentiment and of most dangerous tendency. (Note, Heb. 11:8—10.)—"He that worketh," that is, who "hath deserved any thing by his work, to whom 'is opposed "he that worketh not;" that is, 'who brings no work, for which he claims a 'reward; but depends on the gratuitous promise 'of God. But this indeed is spoken, by concession, in a similitude taken from the commerce and contracts of men: for otherwise, "'who hath first given? and it shall be rendered to him again.'" Beza. (Notes, 11:1—6, vv. 5,6,33—36.)

8 Blessed is the man <sup>t</sup> to whom the Lord will not impute sin. [Practical Observations.]

Note.—In like manner, David, speaking of those among men who were peculiarly happy, did not mention or intimate any thing concerning those who had never sinned, or such as had done works to cover their sins and to justify themselves: but he “described the blessedness of the man, to whom God imputeth righteousness without works,” when he said, “Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven,” and “whose sins are covered.” (Marg. Ref. p—s. —Note, Ps. 32:1,2.) Not that forgiveness of sins is equivalent to justification; for this implies also treating a man as righteous, and entitled to the reward of eternal life: as it is evident, in all human transactions, that the pardon of a criminal is very distinct from giving him the title to an estate. But God always imputes righteousness, where he does not impute sin: for none are pardoned, except in virtue of their relation to Christ by faith, and if his atoning blood cover their sins, his righteousness also justifies their persons. (Note, 2 Cor. 5:18—21, v. 21.) As their Surety, he suffered for their sins, which were imputed to him; and they are rewarded and made heirs of eternal life, because his righteousness is imputed to them. ‘From hence the expression of blotting ‘out iniquity, so frequently used in scripture, ‘may be understood; that is, the striking it out ‘of the account.’ Locke.—It should be remembered, that the inspired apostle, under a clearer dispensation, expounds the words of the prophet; not the prophet the words of the apostle. We must therefore understand David, according to St. Paul’s interpretation; and not the reverse. If St. Paul meant forgiveness exclusively; why should he add the clause, “imputeth righteousness without works?” (Note, 9—12.)—Blessed, &c. (7,8) Exactly from the LXX, Ps. 32:1,2.

faith which he had yet being uncircumcised; that he might be <sup>c</sup> the father of all them that

them who are not of the circumcision only,
but who also walk <sup>f</sup> in the steps of that faith of our father Abraham, which he had being yet uncircumcised.

Note.—The Jews not only supposed that righteousness was by works, but that the privileges of God’s people were inseparably connected with circumcision: the apostle therefore next inquired, whether “the blessedness,” of which he was speaking, was vouchsafed to circumcised persons exclusively, or to the uncircumcised also? This might be readily decided by the case of Abraham. At what time “was faith imputed to him for righteousness?” The answer was undeniable; for it appeared, from the scripture before cited, that he was justified at least fourteen years before he was circumcised; the former having been some time before Ishmael’s birth, the other when Ishmael was thirteen years of age. (Notes, Gen. 15:5,6. 16:1—3. 17:23—27.) It was therefore manifest, that circumcision was not necessary in order to justification: and indeed Abraham received from God circumcision, to be an outward sign of the grace given him, and “a seal of the righteousness of faith” imputed to him, when he was in uncircumcision. (Marg. Ref. y—b.—Notes, Gen. 17:9—13.) This language fully proves that circumcision sealed spiritual blessings to Abraham personally, as the outward seal of the covenant of grace, and the emblem of sanctification, however it might otherwise be applied or misunderstood. ‘This ‘seems an incontestable proof, that circumcis- ‘ion was the seal of the covenant of grace, and ‘not merely of temporal promises; and conse- ‘quently obviates the most considerable objec- ‘tion, that hath ever been urged against infant- ‘baptism.’ Doddridge. (Notes, Heb. 6:13— 20.)—This seal was also a pledge to Abraham, of the performance of the promise respecting his seed, especially his spiritual seed of true believers. (Note, 1—3.) It is manifest, that he was justified before he was circumcised; and this was expressly ordered, for this end, “that he might be the father of all” those believers, who should have the circumcision of the heart, but not the circumcision of the flesh, that they might inherit all his blessings; especially “that righteousness should be imputed to them” also: (Notes, Gal. 3:6—14,26—29.) and he was afterwards circumcised, “that he might be the father of the circumcision also;” not merely the natural progenitor of the nation of Israel, but the spiritual father of all believers among 13 For <sup>e</sup> the promise that he should be the heir of the world, was not to Abraham, or to his seed, <sup>h</sup> through the law, <sup>i</sup> but through the righteousness of faith.

Note.—"The world" cannot here mean the land of Canaan, which is never so called: but "in Abraham and his Seed all the nations of the earth are blessed." (Notes, Gen. 12:1—3, v. 3. Gal. 3:15—18.) Abraham was the root and specimen, of all that multitude all over the earth, on whom the most valuable blessings would be conferred, and who may be said to be "heirs of the world." He was, as it were, the repository, in whom all these blessings were first laid up for their advantage; and also the progenitor of Christ, "the King of kings and Lord of lords," and "Heir of all things." (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 1 Cor. 3:18—23. Heb. 1:5—7. Rev. 5:8—10. 11:15—18. 19:11—16.) This distinction was not given to Abraham through the law, for that was not promulgated till long after; nor to his posterity as under the law, for multitudes of them would be excluded for their sins, especially for unbelief: but it was given to him, through "the righteousness of faith," and they were the true seed, who partook of that same distinction.

The righteousness of faith.] Δικαιοσύνης πιστεως. 11. 9:30. 10:6. Gal. 5:5. Phil. 3:9. Heb. 11:17.—Notes, 9:30—32. 10:5—11. Gal. 5:1—6. Heb. 11:7.

15 Because <sup>m</sup> the law worketh wrath: for <sup>n</sup> where no law is, there is no transgression.

16 Therefore it is <sup>o</sup> of faith, that it might be by grace; to the end <sup>p</sup> the promise might be sure to all the seed: not to that only which is of the law, <sup>q</sup> but to that also which is of the faith of Abraham, who is <sup>r</sup> the father of us all;

17 (As it is written, <sup>s</sup> I have made thee a father of many nations,) <sup>t</sup> before him whom he believed, even God, <sup>u</sup> who quickeneth the dead, <sup>v</sup> and calleth those things which be not as though they were:

Note.—The apostle further argued that if all they, and they only, who were under the law, were heirs; "faith," which the scripture assigned as the immediate cause of Abraham's justification, would be made ineffectual. "It is 'made void to them, who are not of the law, 'because then they cannot by it be made heirs: 'and it is also made void to them that are of the 'law; because they were heirs before, and may 'still be so without it. (15)' Whitby. Indeed, whether the law of reason, or tradition, (under which Abraham was,) or the law of Moses, be considered; instead of giving any man an interest in the promises of God, it must necessarily expose him to condemnation. For "the law worketh wrath," by showing that every transgressor is exposed to the righteous indignation of God: and the clearer, the more copious, and the more express the law is, the more numerous, evident, and aggravated must his transgressions appear. If a man could possibly be without any law, he would not be arraigned and condemned as a criminal: for, as "sin is the transgression of law," no transgression could in that case be charged upon him, who is under no law. (Marg. Ref. k-n.—Notes, 3:19, 20. 5:20, 21, v. 20.) But, as this cannot be the case of any, all men are liable to condemnation: (Note, 5:12—14.) for every man's rule "worketh wrath" against him for acting contrary to it; till he flees for refuge to Christ, who saves all believers from the condemnation of the law, though not from their obligation to obey it. (Notes, 3:9—26. Gal. 3:10—14, 19—22.) As therefore God intended to give multitudes of transgressors a title to the promised blessings: so he appointed it to be "by faith," that it might be of grace," in order to ensure it to all the seed of Abraham, even to all who should ever be made partakers of "like precious faith with" him; not only to those who lived under the law of Moses, but to all others throughout the earth, and in every age of the world. This accorded to the promise, that "God had made Abraham the father of many nations." Several nations indeed naturally descended from him; (Note, Gen. 12:1—3.) yet this promise had a far nobler and more sublime accomplishment, in the immense multitudes from all nations, who have been, are, and hereafter shall be, made partakers in the blessings first conferred on him, in behalf of himself, and of all that should be accounted his children by a living faith. (Marg. Ref. o-r.) This was the case, before that God in whom Abraham believed as to the relation of the whole church to him: for God not only quickens the dead in sin, and so raises up children to Abraham from the nations which were dead in their idolatry and iniquity; but "he calleth those things which be not, as though they were;" and so had all the unnumbered millions of future believers, as it were, present before him, in respect of his foreknowledge and predetermination, when he made the promise to Abraham; and considered him as the father, and them as the family, to whom the inheritance of the blessings was ensured 18 Who <sup>x</sup> against hope believed in hope, that he might become the father of many nations; according to that which was spoken, <sup>y</sup> So shall thy seed be.

22 And therefore <sup>f</sup> it was imputed to him for righteousness.

Note.—The nature and energy of Abraham's faith are next stated. He believed the testimony of God, and expected the performance of his promise, when the case seemed hopeless, or "beyond hope;" and when there was nothing to oppose to the most formidable objections, and apparent impossibilities, but the sure testimony and faithful promise of God. He confidently hoped to become the father of many nations, naturally in his posterity, and spiritually through Christ, who was to descend from him; because God had said, that his seed should be innumerable as the stars of heaven. (Marg. Ref. x, y.—Note, Gen. 15:5,6.) Yet many years had elapsed, since the same promise, for substance, was given; and he still continued without any child by Sarah, to whose offspring the promise was restricted. (Note, Gen. 15:2, 3.) She had been barren all her younger years, and was then become incapable of bearing children, according to the common course of nature; and Abraham was now grown old and unlikely to have any. (Notes, Gen. 17:5—8, 17. 18:9—12.) But though tried by such long delays, and discouraged by such immense difficulties, he did not weakly "stagger at the promise through unbelief;" he did not hesitate most confidently to expect, that God would be as good as his word: and being marvellously strengthened in faith, he gave glory to God, and honored all his perfections, by a full assurance that he was able to perform what he had promised: and therefore "his faith was imputed to him for righteousness." That is, his faith was thus approved to be genuine, meet to form the relation between him and the predicted Redeemer; and thus it marked him out as a proper person, to be justified by the everlasting righteousness which the Messiah would introduce. (Marg. Ref. z—f.—Notes, Gen. 17: 17. Heb. 11:11,12.)—It is evident from the whole context, that Abraham's faith did not justify him, by its own merit or value, but as interesting him in Christ: for, though the sincerity of his faith was manifested on this occasion, he had actually been justified long before; and his example would not in any way aptly illustrate the Christian's justification by the righteousness of Christ, and not by that of his own faith, if we do not thus understand it.—A very common perversion of this passage must not pass unnoticed. Many speak of "hoping against hope;" not that God will fulfil his promises to believers, notwithstanding all difficulties and improbabilities; but that themselves are believers and shall be saved, contrary to the evidence of their tempers and lives: and this is often the grossest presumption and fanaticism imaginable, though sometimes in a measure countenanced by those who are not aware of its tendency.—So shall, &c. (18) From the LXX, but it accords to the Hebrew. alone," or merely to honor his memory; as he had been dead long before Moses recorded it: but it was intended for the instruction of mankind in all future generations; and of those especially to whom the gospel should be preached. If indeed they believed in that God, who had raised Jesus from the dead, and who was able to fulfil his largest promises, their faith would be "imputed to them for righteousness," even as that of Abraham had been: for this faith, if genuine, would form a relation between them and the Lord Jesus, and give them an interest in his righteousness, atonement, and intercession. For, as Jesus had been delivered up to death, by man as a criminal, but by the Father as a sacrifice for the offences of his people; so "he had been raised again for their justification." (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 8:32—34. 1 Cor. 15:12—19. Heb. 13:20,21.) He was thus perfectly justified from the charges brought against him, and the acceptance of his righteousness and redemption was demonstrated: and in this all his people were interested; this justification of the Surety was eventually effectual for the justification of all those who were represented by him, to which privilege every one is actually admitted when he truly believes the testimony, and embraces and relies on the promises of God, according to the gospel. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

No mere man, since the fall of Adam, could ever "find" any thing but death by his own works; and the history contained in the scriptures, with the confessions of the best of men, proves that all who have been saved, escaped condemnation and obtained heaven by "faith being imputed to them for righteousness."—In all controversies we should inquire, "What say the oracles of God?" These uniformly teach, that the reward is not assigned to a man for working, as "a debt;" but through believing, as "of grace." None can sincerely pray for this blessing, till he cease from working in order to justify himself; and indeed no man performs good works from pure principles, till he learns to believe "in him who justifieth the ungodly." Yet at the same time no true believer will neglect "working," in order to glorify God, to do good to men, and to make his own calling and election sure; because he delights in the commandments of God, and "hungers and thirsts after righteousness."—Man's felicity consists in the favor of God, which can belong to none of our fallen race, except the pardoned sinner; and the forgiveness of sin, and the imputation of "righteousness without works," are vouchsafed entirely through the obedience unto death of our gracious Redeemer. Those who obtain this "blessedness" are most happy, though poor, despised, and afflicted; all who come short of it are most miserable, however wealthy, honored, and prospered. This distinction extends to all nations, sects, or forms of worship; some are justified, and some are not, in all countries, where the great truths of the gospel are known: and this method of "justifying the ungodly" is equally suited to preclude the most eminent saints from glorying, and the most atrocious sinners from despairing.

V. 9—25.

The seal of the Holy Spirit, in sanctification, is the inward evidence "of the righteousness of faith;" when the old nature is crucified, and the heart is circumcised to love God, it is evident that we are "the children of Abraham," and walk in his steps: and sacraments will in this case be really seals and pledges of the same blessing.—Blessed be God, that we are not left under the covenant of works. For the more holy and perfect the law, the greater wrath would in that case come upon us; but, as all is "of grace," it is "through faith;" and the promised blessing is ensured to all the chosen seed, wherever dispersed, or however distinguished. May we then copy the example of Abraham; and, in the midst of perils and difficulties, "in hope believe beyond hope;" assured that God is both able and willing to perform his promises to all who trust in him; and waiting the accomplishment of them in patient obedience. Thus our faith will be "imputed to us for righteousness," through him "who died for our offences, and rose again for our justification;" and "because he lives, we shall live also, and live for ever." (Notes, 5:7—10. 8: 32—39. John 14:18—20. Col. 3:1—4.)

CHAP. V.

They who are justified by faith, have peace with God, rejoice in hope, and rejoice and glory in tribulations. 1—5. The abundant love of God to them when sinners and enemies, in reconciling them to himself by the death of his Son," assures them of final salvation, and excites them to rejoice and glory in him, 6—11. As sin and death come upon all men by Adam; so the grace of God, which justifieth unto life, with all concurrent blessings, comes more abundantly on all believers by Jesus Christ, 12—19. The law proved an occasion to the abounding of sin unto death; but this made way for the still greater abounding of grace, as "reigning through righteousness unto eternal life by Jesus Christ," 20, 21.

2 By <sup>d</sup> whom also we have access by faith into this grace <sup>e</sup> wherein we stand, <sup>f</sup> and rejoice in hope of <sup>g</sup> the glory of God.

Note.—The apostle, having stated and confirmed his doctrine, concerning justification, here proceeds more fully to show "the blessedness" of those who are justified. (Note, 4:6—8.) When the sinner believes in Jesus, his "faith is imputed to him for righteousness;" thus he is justified before God, accounted a righteous person, and entitled to the reward of righteousness. 25.) In consequence of this, "he has peace with God;" the controversy, or hostility, which sin had excited, is terminated by a blessed pacification, through the great Mediator; and a covenant of amity is ratified between that holy God who had so just cause to treat his rebellious creature as an enemy, and that rebel who before was so unreasonably alienated from his beneficent Creator. (Marg. Ref. b, c.—Notes, 7—10. 2 Cor. 5:18—21. Col. 1:18—23.) The sinner submits, pleads guilty, seeks mercy, and learns to love and serve God: and his offended sovereign receives him to full favor, and thenceforth behaves to him as his Friend and Father. The believer, being thus reconciled, considers the cause and people of God as his own, and separates from his enemies, that he may be united to his friends: he makes the glory of his God the ultimate end of his habitual conduct: and God protects, countenances, provides for, and communes with him, as his friend: and requites the injuries or favors done to him, as if done to himself. (Notes, Gen. 12:1—3. Is. 41:8,9. John 15:12—16. Jam. 2:21—24.) All this centres in the Person, mediation, and grace, of our Lord Jesus Christ, who has made and preserves this blessed peace. Thus every true believer has actually found admission into a state of full favor with God, even as if he had never sinned: in this he "stands" accepted before God, and is secured by his promise and grace from being cast down from it; and he learns to rejoice and glory, in the prevailing, abiding, and realizing hope, of being glorified with God, and glorifying him; of completely bearing his glorious image, and of enjoying his unspeakable love to all eternity. (*Marg. Ref. d—g.—3:23. Notes, 2:7—11. 8:14—17,28—31. Ps. 73:23—28. 2 Cor. 3:17,18. 4:13—18. 3 And not only so, <sup>h</sup> but we glory in tribulations also, <sup>i</sup> knowing that tribulation worketh patience;

5 And <sup>m</sup> hope maketh not ashamed; <sup>n</sup> because the love of God is <sup>o</sup> shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost, which is given unto us.

Note.—The primitive Christians rejoiced, or exulted, "in hope of the glory of God," not only notwithstanding present afflictions, but they even "gloried" in the tribulations themselves, as the sure pledges of the divine favor, and as means of spiritual improvement. (Marg. Ref. b.—Notes, 2 Cor. 4:13—18. 12:7—10.) For they were assured, from the word of God and from the evidence of facts, that their trials and persecutions produced submission to the divine will, and acquiescence in it, meekness amidst injuries and provocations, "patient continuance in well-doing," and quietly waiting for the Lord in all difficulties, perils, and sufferings. (Marg. Ref. i—l.—Notes, Jam. 1:2—4. 1 Pet. 4:12—16.) Their trials indeed might at first excite impatience; but by watching and praying, they would overcome it: and thus they were wrought into a patience of spirit through trials; as the rough block is wrought into a beautiful statue, by the chisel and labor of the statuary. At the same time this patience produced an enlarged experience; an experimental acquaintance with their own weakness and sinfulness, in order to their humiliation; of the reality and power of grace in their hearts, after repeated trials in the furnace; (Note, 1 Pet. 1:6,7.) of the faithfulness of God to his promises; and of his readiness to answer their prayers. So that, these painful dispensations conducted still further to establish "the hope of glory;" and to assure them; that this hope would never make them ashamed, by vanishing in disappointment; like the baseless confidence of a worldly man, of a Pharisee, an unbelieving Jew, an enthusiast, an antinomian, or a hypocrite. For the hope of the tried and experienced believer is not only warranted by the word of God, but "sealed" upon his heart by the gift of the Holy Spirit; through whose sacred influences the excellency and loving-kindness of God, especially in the work of redemption, are so discovered to him, and poured out through all the faculties of his soul, as to produce a similarity of disposition, a reciprocal love of the divine perfections, a longing desire of the favor of God, a delight in communing with him and serving him, a lively gratitude for his benefits, and zeal for his glory: these, being both full proofs of regeneration, the inward "seal of the righteousness of faith;" and earnestness of heavenly felicity, ensure the Christian's hope from the shame of disappointment. (Marg. Ref. m, u.—Notes, Is. 45:15—17. 1 Pet. 4:12—16.) Many, both writers and preachers, interpret this clause ("the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts,") almost exclusively of the perception and sense of the love of God to us, which is vouchsafed by the Holy Spirit. Yet our love to God, as "the fruit of the Spirit," writing his law in our hearts, is in fact the only indisputable proof that our hope will never make us ashamed. The seal and consolations of the Spirit are distinguished, from all enthusiastical delusions and false affections, by their permanently sanctifying effects: (Notes, 2 Cor. 1:21,22. Eph. 1:13,14. 4:30—32.) no supposed sense of God's love to us, except as attended with the consciousness of loving him, can warrant a scriptural assurance; and the Spirit of adoption is doubtless a Spirit of love to God, as well as confidence in him. (Notes, 8:14—17,28—31. 1 John 4:19.) It must therefore be evident, that the work of the Holy Spirit, in changing our natural enmity against God into supreme love of him, must be intended, either as the primary meaning of the clause, or as the inseparable effect of a genuine sense and perception of the love of God to us.—It cannot be supposed, that the apostle mentioned this triumphant confidence as the habitual attainment of all justified persons: but rather as an invaluable privilege, consequent on justification; which must be sought with diligence, and earnestness, and actually enjoyed nearly in proportion as it is thus sought.—The sufferings of believers, especially from persecution, form a grand objection, to what is spoken in scripture concerning their happiness, in the opinion of men in general. To select, therefore, these very trials, as a special ground of the Christian's glorying and rejoicing, was peculiarly suited to meet that objection, and to produce a great effect on the reader's mind and heart. 6 For <sup>p</sup> when we were yet <sup>q</sup> without strength, * in due time <sup>r</sup> Christ died for the <sup>s</sup> ungodly.

Note.—It might perhaps be objected to the words "hope nakedly not ashamed," that after all, it was not impossible, nor even highly improbable, the believer's hope should terminate in disappointment and shame, through the prevalence of sinful propensities, and the power of temptation; and that Satan might, at length, induce him to apostatize. Some constitutional or habitual iniquity, which in more favorable circumstances had been kept under with great difficulty, might at length obtain the ascendancy through unwatchfulness, and so destroy him; or he might fall away, in the hour of death, or at some other critical season. The apostle therefore digresses in order to obviate this objection: and at the same time shows, what abundant reason believers have to love their God and Saviour; and to adore with admiring complacency the glory of his grace. When they, who are now "at peace with God," lay in the ruins of the fall, under deserved wrath, and the power of sin and Satan, "without strength" to resist their offended Sovereign, or to deliver themselves; when they had neither natural power for so arduous a work, if they had been inclined to it; nor moral ability or inclination to attempt it: when thus impotent, and helpless, and dead in sin, they could have no refuge but in the mere compassion of God. They were also "ungodly," and without any proper disposition of heart towards him, nay, every way contrary to his nature, will, and worship; they were too proud even to ask for mercy, or to allow their need of it, and too averse to true religion, to be at all willing to become spiritual worshippers; yet even then "Christ died for them," in their stead, a sacrifice for their sins, and to make way for their salvation! Some of those indeed, for whom Christ died, had previously gone to heaven; others were godly persons then living on earth; and others had not come into existence: yet they were all considered as "without strength," and as "ungodly," in respect of Christ's dying for them. They all stood, as it were, present before God, according to his omniscience, foreknowledge, and pre-determination, in their natural state of impenitent ungodliness; as Adam, after his transgression: (Notes, Gen. 3:10—18.) and Christ, as their divine and righteous Surety, took their sins upon himself, and engaged to atone for them, before they knew their own lost condition, and without any solicitation from them. In this sense, he is "the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world." (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 1 Pet. 1:17—21. Rev. 13:8—10.) The believers who lived before his coming, were not only pardoned and saved, through his engagement in their behalf; but their repentance, faith, and grace, as the effects of regeneration, sprang from the same source. (Note, 3:21—26.) At length, "in due time," the season appointed by the only wise God, above four thousand years subsequent to the fall of Adam, he appeared on earth, and "died for the ungodly;" and by his Spirit sinners were, and are, quickened from the death of sin, and so brought to repent, believe, love, and obey: but all blessings come to them, through his atonement and intercession. 9 Much more then, <sup>a</sup> being now justified by his blood, <sup>b</sup> we shall be saved from wrath through him.

10 For if <sup>c</sup> when we were enemies, we were <sup>d</sup> reconciled to God by the death of his Son; much more, being reconciled, <sup>e</sup> we shall be saved by his life.

Note.—To illustrate the immensity of this love of God, the apostle shows, that if “a righteous man,” one of strict integrity, who had committed no crime against the welfare of the community, were about to be put to death through the iniquity and oppression of unjust judges, or in any other way were in danger of losing his life; there would scarcely be found a person, who would consent to die in his stead; though perhaps for “a good man,” one of extensive philanthropy, whose life had been and was likely to be a public blessing, some one might even venture to lay down his life. This has in a few cases been done on the field of battle; and perhaps it might be possible to find a man, who would, in such a cause, suffer for his friend, or benefactor, even upon a scaffold. Yet this most rare instance, the very summit of human affection, falls immensely beneath the love of God to us. (Marg. Ref. t.—x.) He, who should give up his life in these circumstances, would do it for a person of superior excellency, or one who had greatly befriended him; and his death would ensure honor and applause to his memory. But the infinitely glorious God had “commended,” or set off to the utmost advantage, “his love to us,” in that his incarnate and co-equal Son gave himself, to endure the most agonizing and ignominious death, for those who were infinitely beneath him; for his creatures who had rebelled against him, and persisted in that ungrateful rebellion; yea, for impenitent sinners, many of whom had perpetrated the most atrocious and multiplied crimes to provoke his vengeance, and all of them rebels and ungrateful, whose state of heart rendered them the meet objects of his abhorrence! Yet, he had freely loved them, and purposed their salvation; and when his justice and holiness, and the honor of his law, obstructed that gracious design, he so loved them, that he gave his own Son to die a sacrifice for their sins! (Marg. Ref. y, z.—P. O. Gen. 22: 13—24. Notes, John 3:16. 15:12—16. 1 John 4:9—12.) Now if this were so; and they, by divine grace, had been brought to repent, and to believe in Christ; and had thus been justified through the shedding of his blood, by faith in that great atonement: “much more” would they be kept from falling again under the wrath of God and perishing in sin, through him who died for them, and rose again. For could it be imagined that he, who so loved them, when enemies, as to die for them, would not save and uphold them by his almighty power, now they were made friends? If, when they were not only destitute of godliness, and impenitent transgressors; but enemies to the holy character, law, sovereignty, grace, providence, and cause of God, they had been brought into a state of reconciliation, and cordial peace with Him, by the death of his Son upon the cross; (Note, 1,2.) “much more” would they, being thus reconciled, be preserved from falling under the power of sin and Satan, or finally apostatizing, “by his life,” his intercession, authority, and omnipotent grace. (Marg. Ref. a—e.—Notes, 8:32—39. John 10:26—31. 14:18—20. Col. 3:1—4. (He, who had done the greater work for them when enemies, would surely do that which was immensely less difficult for them as his friends and children; and the living Lord would complete the purpose of his dying love, by saving all believers to the uttermost, till his finished ransom on the cross should terminate in their finished salvation, as “presented faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy.”—There could be no danger of a reconciled believer falling under the wrath of God, except on the supposition of his committing sin, and dying without repentance; but had Christ suffered, and humbled himself even to death upon the cross, that he might bring him into this state of reconciliation? and would he, after all, so leave him to himself, and in the hands of the wicked one, as thus finally to perish, when his living power could prevent it, without any suffering or self-denial whatever?—Some expositors insert, ‘If we be not waiting to ourselves.’ But first, Is not this undeniably adding to the scripture? (Note, Rev. 22:18—21, v. 18,19.) And, secondly, Does not this inevitably lead us to trust in our own hearts, instead of trusting in God, to “hold us up that we may be safe?” (Notes, Prov. 28: 26. Jer. 17:9,10. 2 Cor. 7:1. Phil. 2:12,13. 2 Pet. 1:5—10.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—Having such a pledge of future and complete salvation, in the love of God through Christ, and in past mercies experienced; the apostle declared that he, and other established believers, not only rejoiced and exulted in the hope of heaven, and in their tribulations for Christ's sake; but they “gloried in God also,” as their unchangeable Friend and all-sufficient Portion: but this was not by the works of the law, as the Jew made his boast in God; but “through our Lord Jesus Christ.” For, according to the law, they were all sinners and enemies, but by Christ they had now “received reconciliation.” (Marg. and Marg. Ref. l, g.) This is the proper translation of the sentence, which refers to the whole of the pacification, between God and the believing sinner through the mediation of Christ; and not merely to the atonement, which is the ground of it.—In exactness of language, God receives the atonement; and believers, in consequence, "receive the reconciliation." As the apostle and his brethren were confident that the great Peacemaker, who had effected this reconciliation, "by the blood of his cross," and the power of his grace, would certainly preserve it; they gloried in God through him, as their God, and everlasting Portion.—To explain all this of the Gentiles exclusively, as some do, as if the Jews did not want a reconciliation, makes the apostle speak of himself as a Gentile: and indeed it is so unscriptural and so irrational; that one cannot but be astonished to find men of great learning and talents contend for it.

13 For <sup>l</sup> until the law sin was in the world; <sup>m</sup> but sin is not imputed when there is no law.

14 Nevertheless <sup>n</sup> death reigned from Adam to Moses, <sup>o</sup> even over them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression, <sup>p</sup> who is the figure of him that was to come.

Note.—In order more fully to illustrate the important subject, the apostle calls the reader's attention to the state of the whole human race, from the fall of Adam. He was the federal head, surety, and representative of all his posterity; nor did sin enter, save to the personal condemnation of Eve, till he also ate the forbidden fruit. (Note, Gen. 3:6.) By that "one man sin entered into the world," to pollute and ruin the whole human species; and so "death," spiritual and temporal, followed and "passed upon all men, for that" (or, "in whom") "all had sinned." In Adam, as being in his loins when he thus apostatized, we all sinned and fell under condemnation; his blood was attainted for rebellion; and thence that evil nature originated, from which all our personal transgressions proceed. (Marg. Ref. h—k.—Notes, Gen. 2: 16,17. 3:17—19.) In proof of this our union with Adam, and our concern in his first transgression, which the proud heart of man is prone to deny, or object to, even with blasphemous enmity, it should be observed, that for two thousand five hundred years before the giving of the law, sin prevailed in the world, and was punished with death: but sin cannot be imputed, where no law is, of which it is a transgression. (Marg. Ref. l, m.—Note, 4:14—17.) None of the immense multitudes, who died between the fall of Adam, and the promulgation of the law, could personally violate the prohibition, to which the penalty of death had been originally annexed; yet they were included in the sentence denounced against Adam, and, after much toil and suffering, "returned to the dust whence they were taken." And, though adults might be thought to die for their personal violation of the law of tradition, or of their own reason and conscience; yet, during this long interval, an innumerable multitude had been subjected to death, who had never broken any law, "after the similitude of Adam's transgression;" that is, wilfully and deliberately. For the number of infants, who had been cut off, with great pain and agony, previously to their commission of actual sin, had been immensely great. They were involved in the destruction of the whole world by the deluge, and in that of Sodom and Gomorrah; and according to the ordinary course of things, "death reigned over them," before they were capable of actual and wilful transgression. Nor could this fact be accounted for, consistently with the divine perfections; otherwise than by allowing that they, as one with Adam, had fallen in him under condemnation, through his violation of that covenant, in which he acted as surety for all his offspring. (Marg. Ref. n—p.) There may indeed be a comfortable hope, that as infants die in Adam, without their own personal transgressions, so they will be saved in Christ, without their own personal faith in him, as never living to be capable of it: yet that change must be wrought in them by the regenerating Spirit, which would have produced faith, had they lived longer. Indeed the sufferings and death of infants, in every age, forms an irrefragable proof of 'original sin:' but it was more peculiarly so, from Adam to Moses; as that law was not then in being, which in some instances, entailed the guilt of the parents on their children, to the third and fourth generation. (Note, Ex. 20:5.) Yet these laws were deduced from the same principle of the oneness between the root and the branches; though only applied in some special cases, while that of Adam reached in general to all his posterity. For he was "a figure," or type, "of him, who was to come," as the Surety of a new covenant, in behalf of all related to him. (Note, 1 Cor. 15:45—49.) In many respects Adam might be considered as the contrast of Christ; but he resembled him, and was his type, in the divine prescience, by acting as the surety of all related and united to him: for thus Christ acted as the Surety of all his people, who are one with him, and deemed his spiritual progeny: (Notes, Ps. 22:30,31. Is. 53:11,12.) and they are interested in his obedience, sufferings, victories, and exaltation.—Adam is compared with Christ, both in what 'is similar, and what is contrary. They are 'alike in this; that each of them shares what he 'has with his: they are clearly unlike in this, 'that Adam by nature communicates sin unto 'death to his posterity; but Christ by grace 'communicates his righteousness to his people, 'unto life.' Beza.—Many learned men explain what is said of "death," as meaning only mortality: but, do we not all derive a depraved, as well as a mortal nature from Adam? And does not Christ save his people from guilt and depravity and eternal punishment, and not from mortality? And would immortality, without justification and sanctification, be a blessing? (Notes, John 5:28,29. 2 Tim. 1:10.) If we are depraved, or "dead in sin," and mortal, as Adam's descendants; we must not only die, but be miserable and unholy for ever, without the salvation of Christ. (Notes, 6:21—23. Gen. 2:16, 17.)—Death reigned. (14) "Sin reigned unto death." (Note, 20,21, v. 21.) What a grand, sublime, tremendous idea! Sin and death personified, as two united conquerors and tyrants reigning over all mankind; and, without mercy, consigning, by various tortures, their bodies to the grave, and their souls to hell!

15 But not as the offence so also is the free gift. For if through the offence of one many be dead; much more the grace of God, and the gift by grace, which is by one man, Jesus Christ, hath abounded unto many.

16 And not as it was by one that sinned, so is the gift: for the judgment was by one to condemnation, but the free gift is of many offences unto justification.

17 For if by one man's offence death reigned by one; much more they which receive abundance of grace, and of the gift of righteousness, shall reign in life by one, Jesus Christ:

18 Therefore, as, by the offence of one, judgment came upon all men to condemnation; even so by the righteousness of one, the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life.

19 For as by one man's disobedience many were made sinners; so by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous.

Note.—The principal thing, which renders the expositions, generally given of these verses, perplexed and unsatisfactory, arises from an evident misconception of the apostle's reasoning, in supposing that Adam and Christ represented exactly the same company: whereas Adam was the surety of the whole human species as his posterity; Christ only of that chosen remnant, which has been, or shall be, one with him by faith, who alone "are counted to him for a generation." (Note, Ps. 22:30,31.) Indeed all men, in consequence of the undertaking of Christ, are under a dispensation of mercy, and are "endured with much long-suffering;" they are not left desperate, they have many temporal mercies, and they shall all arise to judgment. There is likewise such an infinite sufficiency in the atonement of Christ, and it is proposed to sinners in so general a manner, as a common salvation for all who will accept of it, that a foundation is laid for the most unreserved invitations, exhortations, and expostulations; and no one will be rejected, who sincerely seeks this salvation. Yet these important truths perfectly harmonize with the foreknowledge and predetermined purpose of God, in respect of the persons, who actually will embrace and obtain the proffered blessings. If we omit the consideration of the number, who perish in "the first Adam," or are saved in "the second Adam;" if we wholly leave this to the wise, righteous, and merciful Creator and Judge of all men, as one of those "secret things which belong to him," and not to us; and if we exclusively consider the benefits which believers derive from Christ, as compared with the loss sustained in Adam, by the human race: we shall then see the passage open, most perspicuously and gloriously, to our view. For the thoughts of the supposed immense majority of those, who shall eventually perish, is apt to encumber the mind in these contemplations: I say, supposed; for possibly we shall find our conjectures erroneous, when the doom of men, through all ages and nations, shall be finally determined. Let us then advert to the apostle's words.—"The offence" of Adam, and its consequences, do not in all things coincide with the "free gift," or the grace, of redemption. Through that one man's single offence, "the many," or the multitude, of mankind are dead; under condemnation, dead in sin, and exposed to death temporal and eternal. But the infinite grace and mercy of God, and the free gift of righteousness and salvation, through that "one man Jesus Christ," "the second Adam," who is also "the Lord from heaven," much more abound to "the many," even to all the multitude of believers; by bringing them into a far safer, happier, and more exalted state, than that from which they fell in Adam. (Marg. Ref. q—t.) For this gift, not merely answers to the loss sustained by Adam's sin, but far exceeds it in this respect: "the judgment of God" came through Adam's single offence, "upon all men to condemnation; but the free gift" not only delivers believers from that "condemnation," but from the punishment due to their own numerous, or rather innumerable transgressions: nor does it place them anew in a state of probation, at all resembling that of Adam before he sinned; but it fixes them in a state of justification, even as Adam would have been, if he had stood his time of trial. For if, by "one offence of one man," death acquired a complete dominion over the whole human race, without a personal trial, in that respect, whether they would be obedient or not; much more will they, who by faith "receive the abundance of grace," and of the gift of "righteousness," be assuredly preserved in that state of acceptance, and so "reign in life" by the perfect obedience of their one Surety Jesus Christ; without the infinite peril, or inevitably fatal consequences, of being put upon a personal trial of their perfect obedience, like that in which Adam had failed, and in which Christ had persevered. (Marg. Ref. u—x.) Man is indeed, in some respects, in a probationary state on earth: but no man is put upon the trial, whether he can obtain exemption from the general condemnation of Adam and his seed, by his own personal obedience. A trial is made of him, tending to discover the wickedness of his heart by manifold experiments; the trial is made by the gospel, whether the sinner will repent and believe; professed Christians are tried, whether they are sincere or not; and believers are proved in respect of the strength of their faith and grace: yet they are not put upon any probation, with reference to their justification and eternal life; but "are accounted righteous," and appointed heirs by faith alone, through the righteousness of their One divine Surety; which consisted not, like Adam's offence, in one action, but in a continued and perfect conformity to the whole divine law, through life, and unto his death upon the cross.—Yet, notwithstanding these differences, the similarity is striking and instructive: for, "as by the one offence of one man, sin entered," and prevailed to the condemnation of all men; so, by "the righteousness of One," even Christ, grace entered and prevailed to the complete justification of all men, throughout the earth, and during all ages, who are related to Christ by grace and faith, or by regeneration, and partaking of the life-giving Spirit of Christ; as all men were related to Adam by natural generation. For, as "by the disobedience" of one single person, being a public character, or representative of his posterity, "many were made" or constituted "sinners," and dealt with accordingly, previously to the consideration of their personal transgressions: so, "by the obedience of One," who also was a public character, and the representative of his people, "many," even the whole multitude of believers, "are constituted righteous" before God, and dealt with as such; even previously to the consideration of their personal holiness and obedience; which spring from their spiritual union with Christ, as depravity does from man's natural union with Adam. (Marg. Ref. y—f.) Thus, in many things, the type and the Antitype coincide; though disobedience and condemnation are opposite to obedience and justification. But the believer, being justified by faith, has his title to life in Christ, who preserves it for him: so that he is not left to peradventures, or to the hazards arising from the mutability of creatures, as Adam was: but he is safe by his union with Him, who is "God manifest in the flesh;" and his future felicity will be proportionably more exalted, in consequence of his endeared relation to the Godhead, in Christ his Brother and Friend.—Much more, &c. (17) Can any thing be "much more" certain, than that all men as one with Adam die? Yes, it is much more certain that all, who, by faith "receive the abundance of grace and the gift of righteousness, shall reign in life with Christ." Enoch and Elijah did not die, but were translated; and multitudes innumerable shall be living when Christ shall come: (Note, 1 Cor. 15:50—54.) but not one true believer shall come short of "reigning in life with him!"—As it is evident, that all men, in the strict sense of the word, do not "receive abundance of grace and of the gift of righteousness," or obtain "justification of life;" and that "all men," in this universal sense, shall not "reign in life;" for some shall "go away into everlasting punishment;" so the term must be explained, in the first clause, of all men in Adam, and in the second of all men in Christ, if any consistent meaning is to be affixed to the words (18): except universal "salvation, with eternal glory," be contended for; as "justification unto life," and "reigning with Christ in life" are predicated emphatically of the whole company here described. It may, indeed, be admitted, that the "free gift" is sufficient for "all men," and ought to be proposed to "all men;" and if "all men" (18) be thus understood, as some think it may be, it differs from the "many" in some of the other verses: yet the apostle's argument seems, through the whole, to be concerning the same companies, those in Adam and those in Christ.

whole Mosaic dispensation, "entered" in accession to the preceding revelations among a few persons, compared with the whole posterity of Adam: and for a short time, compared with the duration of the world: i. e. among the sons of Jacob alone; and above two thousand five hundred years after the creation of the world. But, so far from being intended for the justification of those who received it, "it entered that the offence might abound." The moral law, by its perfection, showed that very many thoughts, affections, tempers, words, and actions were sinful, which otherwise would not have been known to be so. (Note, 3:19,20.) It evinced the malignity and desert of every sin; and it irritated man's natural corruption, both to hanker after forbidden objects, and to rise in opposition and enmity against its spiritual precepts, and its righteous sanction. (Note, 7:7—14.) Thus it occasioned transgressions to be multiplied, for it had no efficacy to cure human depravity: (Note, 8:3,4.) and at the same time it aggravated the enormity of sin, seeing it was committed against so express a declaration of the divine will. Even the ceremonial law, as considered apart from Christ, multiplied duties, and consequently transgressions; as none perfectly kept it, and numbers constantly violated it. (Marg. Ref. g.) So that the law in every sense "entered," in order to show and condemn man's abounding wickedness, as an experiment tried with a part of the human race; that the free grace of redemption might be more gloriously displayed, by its superabounding, where sin had most abounded; and (like the waters of the deluge,) flowing far above the summits of the highest mountains of man's guilt and depravity. (Marg. Ref. h.—Notes, Gal. 2:17—21. 3:19—22.)—Therefore, as "sin," like some terrific victor and tyrant, had "reigned" with uncontrolled sway, unto the death and ruin of all men, under Adam's covenant: (Note, 12—14.) even so "grace," or the infinitely free and rich mercy of God, might ascend a more exalted throne, and there reign with benign authority, through the righteousness of the Surety of the new covenant, unto the eternal life of all who believed; in virtue of the power and grace of the Lord Jesus Christ. (Marg. Ref. i—m.)—Grace reigns also in the believer's heart: but this is more explicitly treated on in the ensuing chapter; and grace as reigning upon the throne of God, to justify every believing sinner, however his past transgressions have been multiplied and aggravated, and to complete the salvation of every justified believer, is here specially intended. As "grace reigns unto eternal life" to those alone who are in Christ by faith; so these exclusively must be intended, in the whole contrast between the first and the second Adam.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

A most blessed change takes place in the sinner's state, however guilty and depraved he has been, when he becomes a true believer: "being justified by faith he hath peace with God," through "our Lord Jesus Christ;" and this will in due time be communicated to his conscience, and dwell in his heart: he has free access to the mercy-seat; he is established in the grace and favor of God; and he may now rejoice and triumphantly exult in the hope of everlasting glory; though he perhaps just before trembled, from well grounded apprehensions of deserved vengeance. How immense then are our obligations to him, who has made "all things ready" by his agonizing death on the cross; and has made our hearts willing by his regenerating grace! May we act as the covenanted friends of our reconciled God; may we "adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things;" may we study to recommend it to our fellow sinners, and to make grateful returns for his love, by our kindness to our poor fellow Christians, who are the brethren and receivers of this our rich and bountiful Benefactor! (Notes, Matt. 12:46—50. 25:34—40.) Then we need not be dismayed by temptations and afflictions, or despond and murmur under them; nay, we may "glory" and rejoice in them: for, though nature feels that "tribulation worketh" impatience, yet grace finds that at length it produces "patience, experience," and hope, even "hope which maketh not ashamed; because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost." This seal of God cannot be broken, and Satan evidently and peculiarly fails in his attempts to counterfeit it: for all false affections, and enthusiastic confidences, are liable to be consumed in the furnace of long-continued afflictions; and they never can communicate that reciprocal, steady, pre-eminent, and abiding love of God in Christ, which no fire can burn, no waters can quench, and which in ten thousands of instances has proved stronger than the fear of death in its most tremendous forms; and has enabled a feeble believer to disregard the cruelty of a savage executioner, in comparison of the anguish of wilfully denying or disobeying his beloved Lord. Surely he is worthy of all this devotedness from every one of us! If we consider how "helpless, and ungodly," rebellious, and full of enmity against God, we were, when his compassionate eye was first fixed upon us; if we reflect on the salvation purposed for us, the price paid for it, the dignity of our Redeemer, the change wrought in us, before we were willing cordially to accept of the free gift, and the privileges most graciously bestowed upon us; we cannot but allow, that the love of God our Saviour "passeth knowledge," and is infinitely beyond example or illustration. (Notes, Eph. 3:14—19. 1 John 3:1—3.) It is inconceivable, that even God himself could more have "commended his love to us," or have given us more powerful motives and encouragements to humble submission and grateful obedience. In proportion as we feel the force of these motives, we may be assured that we are "justified by the blood of Jesus," and "reconciled to God by his death;" and that we shall be saved from wrath by him, "who was dead, and is alive for evermore, and hath the keys of death and hell." (Notes, John 11:20—27. Rev. 1:12—20.) Though conscious of our own sinfulness, we may thus "glory in God through Jesus Christ," as our almighty, unchangeable, and everlasting Father, Friend, and Portion; and as having "received the reconciliation." (Notes, Ps. 48:14. Heb. 11:13-16.) At the same time we shall learn not to disdain or despair of any other sinners: for we shall be conscious, that they are not worse in themselves, or further from God, than we once were; and that they are equally capable of being reconciled in the same way, whatever their character and crimes may heretofore have been.

Let us from this portion of the sacred scriptures learn habitually to look upon ourselves, and the whole human race, as lying in the ruins of the fall; sinners by nature and practice, exposed to condemnation, and no more able to save our own souls from hell, than to rescue our bodies from the grave. Instead of perplexing ourselves about the awfully deep and incomprehensible, but most righteous dispensation of God, in permitting the entrance of sin and death; let us learn to adore his grace for providing so adequate a remedy for that awful catastrophe, which we are sure was consistent with all his glorious perfections. (Note, Gen. 2:16,17.)—As our children have evidently, through us, received a sinful, suffering, and dying nature from the first Adam; we should be stirred up, even by their pains and sorrows in helpless infancy, to seek for them the blessings of the second Adam's righteousness and salvation. (Note, 1 Cor. 15:45-49.) Though "the grace of God," and the gift by grace, have "much more abounded" to the many "through Christ," than justice and wrath did through Adam; yet multitudes choose to remain under the horrid dominion of sin and death, rather than seek the blessings of "the reign of grace!" But there is the fullest encouragement to every sinner, who comes to Christ for his free and holy salvation; and he "will in no wise cast out" one humble suppliant. Let all then flee, without delay, to "this righteousness, by faith in Christ," whilst grace fills the throne of God, and before the Judge ascends his dread tribunal: let the entrance of the law into the conscience, that sin may be known to abound, impel the sinner to the greater diligence in applying for salvation: let none be discouraged by the view of their enormous crimes, seeing there is in Christ "much more abounding grace:" let the unestablished inquirer give diligence to make sure his interest in the Redeemer; and let the thankful and confirmed believer frequently meditate on his obligations, privileges, securities, and prospects. Let him contrast his state in Adam, with his felicity in Christ: that, while he gives all the glory to divine grace, through that "obedience by which he is made righteous;" he may look at all enemies and remaining obstacles, and at "the king of terrors," with a victorious hope; assured that "grace shall still reign through righteousness, unto eternal life, by Jesus Christ our Lord."

CHAP. VI.

Believers cannot "sin in that grace may abound," as some would object: See "dead to sin," according to the meaning of Baptism, which represents their conformity to Christ in his death, burial, resurrection, and living unto God, 1-10. They should reckon themselves to be "dead to sin and alive to God," 11; and, as not being "under the law, but under grace," they must not suffer "sin to reign in their bodies, but yield them to God, as instruments of righteousness," 12-15. Being "made free from sin, and become servants to righteousness," they should serve righteousness wholly, 16-20. The service of sin is unfruitful, shameful, and destructive; but the servants of God have their "fruit unto holiness, and the end eternal life," 21,22. This is the free gift of God in Christ; but death is the wages of sin, 23.

Note.—(Note, 5:20,21.) The apostle was aware that his doctrine might seem open to the objection, which is now continually made to that of "salvation by grace." (Note, 3:29-31.) It might be said, that if we be justified of entire mercy, by the imputation of Christ's righteousness, and the efficacy of his sacrifice, through faith alone, without works of any kind, or in any degree, either before or after believing; are not men set free from all moral obligation, and the flood-gates of licentiousness thrown open? And, if God take occasion from man's excess in wickedness, the more conspicuously to display his abounding grace: may we not safely, and even on principle, commit more and greater enormities, and continue to work iniquity without remorse or amendment, on purpose that the riches of divine grace may be the more glorified in our salvation? This is specious: and self-deceived hypocrites, through Satan's suggestions, comment in this manner on the gospel; and so give some color to the cavils of avowed opposers. But the apostle has taught us how to answer all objections, and guard against abuses on this ground. He does not set us an example of keeping out of sight, explaining away, or cautiously proposing the free grace of the gospel: but, while he states his doctrine in the most explicit and decisive language imaginable, he shows also the inseparable connexion between justification and sanctification. Let "the thought be abhorred," says he, "of continuing in sin that grace may abound." The unbeliever has no part in that grace: and, as the believer is "dead to sin, how shall he live any longer" in the practice of it? That view of the glory of God, of the holiness and excellency of the law, and of his own guilt and danger, which, as the effect of regeneration, convinced him that he needed the salvation of Christ, and made it precious to his heart, led him also to repent, and to abhor all sin. This change, begun in convictions, always humbling and often alarming, was more completely effected by further discoveries of the mercy, and experience of the comforts, of redemption: so that love and gratitude to the divine Saviour, and other evangelical principles, concur with hatred of sin, to mortify his affections to its pleasures and interests, and to cause him to separate from iniquity, as a dead man ceases from the actions of life. (Marg. Ref. c-f.—Notes, John 16:8-11,14,15. 2 Cor. 5:13-15. Gal. 2:17-21. 5:13-26. Jam. 2:8-26.) Not only ought this to be the believer's character, but in a measure it actually is so:

John 3:9. f 2 Cor. 5:14-17. 1 Pet. 1:14. e 5:11. 7:4. Gal. 2:13. 6:14. 4:1-3. Col. 3:3. 1 Pet. 2:24.

and thus it forms the proper evidence, being the inseparable concomitant, of his justification. This effectually secures him from abusing the doctrines of grace: he may be seduced into sin, but he "cannot live any longer" in the habitual practice of known transgression: (Note, 1 John 3:4—10.) he cannot take occasion from grace as superabounding, to continue in sin that it may still more abound; but, on the contrary, in proportion to his admiring views of the riches of divine mercy in his salvation, he will be "steadfast, unmoveable, and always abounding in the work of the Lord;" and he will be remiss in duty, at those times alone, when such hopes and affections grow languid and low.—"The benefits of justification and sanctification are connected by a perpetual bond; each of them flows from Christ, by the grace of God. Sanctification is the destruction of sin, that is, of original depravity; in the place of which the purity of a renewed nature succeeds. This is the quality, which the Spirit creates in the members of Christ our Head.—"Dying unto sin," and "living unto God," or Christ, or righteousness, answer to each other." Beza.—It is surprising, that many learned expositors should, without hesitation or proof, interpret the phrase, as if it only meant the outward profession made in baptism: and, as if all baptized persons were indeed "dead unto sin." Note here, that if the faith, to which St. Paul in this epistle doth ascribe justification, did not only oblige to, but even comprehend 'evangelical and constant obedience, there could be no color for this objection: that therefore 'must be a mistake.' Whitby.

3 * Know ye not, that so many of us, <sup>h</sup> as * were baptized into Jesus Christ, <sup>i</sup> were baptized into his death?

4 Therefore <sup>k</sup> we are buried with him by baptism into death; <sup>l</sup> that like as Christ was raised up from the dead <sup>m</sup> by the glory of the Father, <sup>n</sup> even so we also should walk in newness of life.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The apostle, by his introductory question, most emphatically shows, that all who had been baptized into the name and religion of Jesus, had received the sign, and made the profession, of communion with him, and conformity to him in his death; that, in virtue of his dying for their sins, they should die to all sin, and have done with their former unholy indulgences, pursuits, habits, and connexions. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. g, h.—Notes, 2:25—29. 1 Cor. 12:12—14. Gal. 3:26—29. Col. 2:11,12. 1 Pet. 3:21,22. 2 Pet. 1:8,9.) This profession was equivalent to "being buried with Christ," as dead with him. For, as his burial was a manifestation that he was really dead, and an introduction to his immediate resurrection, by the glorious power of the Father, and for the display of his glory: so the baptism of a converted Jew, or Gentile, was a professed manifestation of his death to sin, and to all his carnal expectations, affections, and pursuits, from which he meant to be entirely secluded, as one buried is from the affairs of life; and it was a professed introduction to his walking "in newness of life," not only as to his outward actions, but with respect to his inward principles. (Marg. Ref. k—n.—Note, 7:5,6.) The spiritual meaning of the external sign is the same, when baptism is administered to the infant-offspring of believers: even as the meaning of circumcision was the same, when it was performed on Abraham the aged believer, on Ishmael who perhaps never believed, and on Isaac an infant of eight days old, long before he believed. (Notes, 4:9—12. Gen. 17:7—12. Matt. 23:19,20.) It was the outward sign of regeneration, or 'a death unto sin, and a new birth unto righteousness;' and it sealed justification by faith to all those who ever possessed the thing signified, but to none else. Thus Simon Magus, though baptized adult, derived no more benefit from the outward sign, than those multitudes do, who, having been baptized in infancy, when grown up despise the inward and spiritual grace of it. (Notes, Acts 8:9—13,36—40.) Great stress has been laid upon the expression, "buried with him by baptism into death," as proving that baptism ought to be performed by immersion, to which the apostle is supposed to allude. (Note, Col. 2:11,12.) But we are said also to be "crucified with Christ," and circumcised with him, without any allusion to the outward manner in which crucifixion and circumcision were performed: and, as baptism is far more frequently mentioned, with reference to the "pouring out" of the Holy Ghost; (Notes, Acts 1:4—8. 2:14—21. Tit. 3:4—7.) and as the apostle is evidently treating on the inward meaning, not the outward form, of that ordinance; no conclusive argument is deducible from the expression, showing that immersion is necessary to baptism; or even, apart from other proof, that baptism was generally thus administered.

'compares Christ, who died and was buried, and rose again from the dead, to a plant, which, being covered in the earth, germinates in due time. And then, because he had said, 'that we are "dead to sin, and buried with Christ," that we might rise again unto righteousness; in order to intimate that all these things take place, by the grace which we derive from Christ, he says that we have grown together with him into one plant; as those things which are "planted together" with a tree, grow together, and live by one common sap.' Beza. 'We grow together with Christ, as moss, ivy, mistletoe, or such like, grow up by a tree, and are nourished by the juice thereof.' Leigh. Sinful men then become "one with Christ," by partaking of the Holy Spirit, which animates his whole mystical body, as the soul does our natural bodies; and by the teaching and influence of the Holy Spirit, they believe unto justification: and then faith renders them in that way "one with Christ;" but the same Spirit also inclines and enables them to mortify all their sinful passions, and thus renews their souls unto holiness. If then, a man be "planted together" with Christ "in the likeness of his death," he must certainly will be conformed to him "in the likeness of his resurrection;" and, by motives and grace derived from him, habitually live a holy life, according to a new rule, and for new ends and purposes. (Marg. Ref. o, p.—Note, 7:5,6.) For he will know, that Christ was crucified to atone for sin, in order that he might mortify and destroy it. So that the corrupt nature, the "old man," is, in all true believers, crucified with Christ, by the grace derived from his cross. It is deprived of dominion, and proscribed as an enemy and condemned criminal: its destruction is absolutely determined: it is weakened, confined, and in a disgraced, suffering, and dying state; though it yet lives and struggles for life, and even for liberty and victory. Nor is there any intention, either in the believer or his gracious Lord, to release the crucified rebel: die he must, though in a lingering manner; the whole body of sin, every kind and degree of non-conformity to the holy law of God, must be "abolished" and destroyed; that the believer may no more be the slave of sin, and that at length he may be finally delivered from its harassing emotions. (Marg. Ref. q—s.) For he that is dead to the love and practice of sin is freed for ever from its yoke: he has passed into the service of another master; sin has no further claim upon him, and shall never recover its lost authority. (Marg. Ref. t.—Notes, 8:3,4,12,13. Gal. 5:22—26. Col. 2:11,12.) Thus the seventh verse is commonly explained; but it is most exactly translated: "He that is dead, has been justified from sin;" (Marg.—Note, 8:1,2.) and the literal meaning seems still more aptly to coincide with the apostle's argument: he, and he only, who "is dead to sin," has been justified from the guilt of it, "having received the free gift unto justification of life." (Note, 5:15—19, v. 18.) His death to sin is the requisite attestation of his being accounted righteous; so that the doctrine, properly understood, is incapable of that perversion which is generally objected to it.—Indeed, Christ when "he died unto sin once," (10) was justified as our Surety and Exemplar, in consequence of his death: so that the believer's conformity to his Lord, of which the apostle discourses, is illustrated by the literal translation.—Our old man. (6) Our depraved nature is called "a man," because it comprises a complete system of unholy dispositions and affections, and imparts its baleful influence to the whole soul and body: and the "old man;" because derived from the first Adam, and so in every one prior to grace, or the image of the second Adam. 8 Now <sup>u</sup> if we be dead with Christ, <sup>x</sup> we believe that we shall also live with him:

10 For in that he died, <sup>a</sup> he died unto sin once: but in that he liveth, <sup>b</sup> he liveth unto God.

Note.—The promise of God to give life, even eternal life, to all who believe, is the sole ground of our hope of obtaining the inestimable blessing: but as all who hear the gospel do not obtain it, nor all who profess and seem to believe it; how shall we know, that we, rather than our fellow-sinners, are partakers of the promise, except by being conscious of having experienced a 'death unto sin, and a new birth 'unto righteousness?' If a professed Christian is a stranger to this change, his confidence of "reigning with Christ in glory" is presumptuous. But when a man becomes dead to his once most beloved sinful pleasures, and pursuits; his prospect is clear, and his interest in the righteousness of the Surety is demonstrated. (Marg. Ref. u, x.—Notes, 5:6—10. John 14:18—20. Gal. 2:17—21.) "Christ rose from the dead, no more" to be subjected to death; seeing the end for which he died was fully answered. He could never have been liable to death, had it not been on account of our sins, imputed to him as our Surety, to expiate which "he died unto sin once:" (Note, Heb. 9:24—26.) but, having accomplished that grand and gracious design, he rose again, and now in our nature, as one with the Father, he lives a heavenly life, in unspeakable exaltation and felicity, to the glory of the divine perfections and government, by carrying on and perfecting his mediatorial work, "as Head over all things to his church." manner, therefore, in conformity to his death and resurrection, "we die unto sin," are delivered from its dominion, and rise to a new life, to fall no more under that bondage; but henceforth for ever to live unto God, and to find happiness in his holy service, and in glorifying his name.—As the blessed Jesus was in himself wholly free from sin; it seems impossible to find any satisfactory meaning in the words, "He died unto sin once;" unless we allow, that he died as an atoning sacrifice for the sins of men which were imputed to him, and that he "bare them in his own body on the tree." 11 Likewise reckon ye also yourselves to be dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord.

Note.—The preceding verses declare the character and experience of real Christians, according to their measure of grace: but the apostle here proceeds to exhort professed Christians to evince their sincerity by a suitable conduct; and believers to live up to their privileges, and in consistency with their profession. For this end, let them "account themselves to be dead indeed unto sin," and be influenced by this to a resolute rejection of all its allurements and temptations: and let them consider themselves, as "alive unto God" through the redemption of his Son; that they may experience more powerfully the motives of the gospel, to devote all their lives, talents, and capacities to his service, and to seek all their happiness in glorifying him. (Marg. Ref.)

Reckon.] λογίζεσθε. See on 3:28.—Dead unto sin.] Νεκροί η̄ ἀνομιᾶ. Eph. 2:1,5. Col. 2:13. The context clearly shows, that being "dead to sin," or "from sin," is meant; and not "dead in sins;" and sanctification by union with Christ, not pardon through his atonement, is the benefit insisted on. This appears by the clause "Our old man is crucified with him" (6): that is, not our persons but our depraved nature and propensities.—(Note, 1,2.)

12 Let not sin therefore reign in your mortal body, that ye should obey it in the lusts thereof:

13 Neither yield ye your members as instruments of unrighteousness unto sin: but yield yourselves unto God, as those that are alive from the dead; and your members as instruments of righteousness unto God.

Note.—The vicious affections, like noxious weeds, sprout up and increase of themselves

but too naturally; while the graces of the Christian temper, exotics in the soil of the human heart, like the more tender productions of the vegetable world, (though the breath of heaven must quicken them,) require on our part also, in order to their being preserved in health and vigor, constant superintendance and assiduous care. Wilberforce's View of Practical Christianity.—But none therefore suffer sin to reign in their bodies, (which are indeed become mortal, and which no attention or care or gratification can preserve from the grave,) that they should obey and comply with its corrupt lustings, to the injury of their immortal souls. If a professed Christian does this habitually, he can have no evidence of his conversion; as provision is made in the gospel for deliverance from the dominion of sin, as well as from condemnation: and if a real Christian does this in any particular instances, it must weaken his evidence and confidence; and it is the effect of partial unbelief, unwatchfulness, and forgetfulness of his obligations and privileges. (Marg. Ref. g—i.—Notes, 8:12, 13. 1 Cor. 9:24—27.) Let then none yield, or consign over, the members, senses, or organs of their bodies, to be employed as the instruments, or weapons, of the carnal propensities of the soul, in doing the work or carrying on the warfare of unrighteousness, by the commission of sin; by being inlets to sinful thoughts or affections into the heart; by communicating the inward evil to pollute others with corrupt words; (Note, Jam. 3:3—12.) or by gratifying any sensual, malevolent, covetous, or ambitious inclination. But rather let them "yield" and give up themselves wholly unto God, as alive from the condemnation and death of sin, by his abundant grace; that all their powers of body and soul may be consecrated to his service, as instruments of his work, in all righteousness, to his glory; or as weapons with which to fight his battles, against sin, the world, and Satan. (Marg. Ref. k—n.—Notes, 2 Cor. 5:13—15. 2 Cor. 10:1—6.) Thus our eyes should be employed in contemplating the works, and reading the word, of God; our ears, in hearing his voice, and in attending to the cries of the distressed; our tongues in speaking the praises of God, instructing the ignorant, preaching his word, and in profitable conversation: and even our natural inclinations should be so regulated by his law, and subordinated to superior considerations, that "whether we eat, or drink, or whatever we do, we may do it to the glory of God." (Notes, 16—19. 12:1. 1 Cor. 6:18—20. 10:29—33. Phil. 1:19,20. Col. 3:16,17. 1 Pet. 2:11.)—Is it not most evident, that sin is here represented as having its seat in the soul, which employs the members of the body, as instruments of accomplishing its evil purposes? And if so, what becomes of that system of interpretation, which supposes animal nature to be the flesh, and the rational soul the spirit? (Notes, 7:15—25. 8:1—13. Gal. 5:16—26.)

14 For °sin shall not have dominion over you: p for ye are not under the law, but q under grace.

15 r What then? s shall we sin, because we are not under the law, but under grace? God forbid. [Practical Observations.]

Note.—Hope of victory gives fresh ardor to the courageous: assurance of it would make a coward valiant. The slave emancipated from his yoke, or the captive escaped from his dungeon, will resist all attempts to reduce him to his former abject state, with a vigor proportioned to the prospect of preserving his beloved liberty. Thus the apostle assures believers, that sin shall not resume its hated dominion over them, in order to animate their opposition to its influence, in every instance. He shows, that the ground, for this assurance of final liberty and victory, lies in the nature and securities of the new covenant. (Marg. Ref. o—q.—Notes, 2 Sam. 23:5. Is. 56:1—3. Jer. 31:31—34. 32:39—41. Heb. 8:7—13.) He could not intend, merely to distinguish between the Mosaic dispensation and that of the gospel; for all were not slaves to sin who were under the former, nor are all free from sin who live under the latter. But the moral law, as the foundation of the covenant of works, in whatever way or degree it is known, is evidently opposed to the covenant of grace. All, who remain under the covenant of works, must be held under “the dominion of sin,” and their efforts to emancipate themselves be unsuccessful; because no grace is by it promised or communicated to a sinner. (Note, Ex. 19:5.) But the believer passes from under this covenant, to be under that of mercy and grace; and as motives and encouragements are by it supplied, so effectual help is ensured to him, to preserve him from ever again becoming the willing slave of any sin; though he may be grievously harassed, baffled, or even polluted, by those temptations and corruptions, to which he once was wholly subjected. (Notes, 7:15—25.) As an objection to this, it is here inquired by some supposed opponent, May Christians then safely commit sin, because “they are not under the law but under grace?” To this the apostle answers with his usual energetic expression of abhorrence.

A carnal man, taking it for granted that he is not “under the law, but under grace;” because of some change of notions or flow of affections, may thus pervert the doctrine of perseverance, as well as that of justification: but the true believer cannot; his heart rises against the hated suggestion, and he must reject it with decided detestation: or if betrayed to yield to it in any instance; he must abhor himself, and deeply repent of such horrid ingratitude and perverseness. (Notes, 1,2. Gal. 5:16—18. 1 John 3:4—10.)

Under the law. (14) Ὑπο νομον. 15. See on 4:15.

16 t Know ye not, that u to whom ye yield yourselves servants to obey, his servants ye are to whom ye obey; x whether of sin unto death, or of obedience unto righteousness?

17 But y God be thanked, z that ye were the servants of sin: a but ye have obeyed from the heart b that form of doctrine * which was delivered you.

18 Being then c made free from sin, ye became the d servants of righteousness.

19 I e speak after the manner of men, f because of the infirmity of your flesh: for g as ye have yielded your members servants to uncleanness, and to iniquity h unto iniquity; even i so now yield your members servants to righteousness k unto holiness.

Note.—It could not but be known, and acknowledged, that all Christians were “the servants of God.” (Notes, Is. 54:15—17. John 12:23—26.) The apostle therefore demanded, whether it might not be proved, what master any man served, by observing the constant tenor of his conduct. A person may do an occasional service for one, to whom he is not servant: but no doubt he is the servant of that man, to whom he habitually yields and addicts himself; and in whose work he spends his time and strength, and skill, and abilities, day after day, and year after year. The case is the same in spiritual matters: a man may profess Christianity, and in some things appear to serve God; and yet habitually addict himself to sinful pursuits and pleasures. (Marg. Ref. u.—Note, Matt. 6:24.) But every one must be adjudged to be the servant of that master, to execute whose commands he willingly “yields himself;” (Note, 2 Chr. 30:12.) whether it be the sinful propensities of his own heart, in such actions as lead to death; or the new and spiritual obedience implanted by regeneration, in habitually performing the righteousness required in the law, and daily seeking, and striving, and praying, to be more and more exactly conformed to it. (Marg. Ref. x.) The apostle, however, not only congratulated the Romans, but likewise thanked God, on account of the change which had taken place in them. They had been the willing devoted slaves of sin, which they uniformly obeyed, by gratifying their various worldly and sensual inclinations, without regard to the authority or glory of God. But they had now cordially obeyed the call of the gospel; they had "been delivered," or "cast into the very fashion of it," as melted metal receives and retains the exact impression of the mould, into which it is poured. Being thus renewed into the nature of the humble, holy, and loving gospel of Christ; they were set at liberty from the slavery of sin, and "became the servants of righteousness," obeying the dictates of that new nature, which is, as it were, God's representative in the heart, even as sin is that of Satan. These things the apostle stated to the Christians at Rome, by similitudes taken from the affairs of men, "because of the infirmity of their flesh:" which rendered them less capable of understanding abstract reasonings on subjects of this kind; and that he might guard them against these delusions, to which their weakness and remaining sinfulness would otherwise expose them. As therefore, before their conversion, they had "yielded their bodies," as the instruments of their souls, to be "the slaves" of uncleanness and injustice; thus continually accumulating guilt, adding strength to evil propensities, and furthering the cause of wickedness and ungodliness in the world; even so ought they now to devote themselves wholly to be "the servants of righteousness," or to execute constantly the commands of God, the dictates of his Spirit, and the motions of the new nature: that, by progressive sanctification, they might press forward to perfect holiness; and do what they could to render others also holy and happy. 20 For when ye were <sup>1</sup>the servants of sin, ye were free * from righteousness.

Note.—The willing slaves of sin, though by no means free from obligations to be righteous, are yet unrestrained by these obligations in following their own carnal inclinations. They perform no service to righteousness; they are not influenced by a single regard to the glory or authority of God, in any of their actions; but they uniformly gratify some of their own unholy passions, and seek happiness in so doing; or in one way or other, are actuated by selfish motives: so that nothing which they do is "good before God."

"The dominion of sin" consists in willingly being slaves to it; not in being harassed by its hated power, and occasional prevalence; as an expelled usurper struggling to resume his throne: and being "made free from sin," means deliverance from the "dominion of sin;" not an exemption from its distressing and hated strugglings for victory and dominion; as many erroneously suppose, to their deep disconsolation. (Note, Luke 11: 14—26, vv. 21, 22.)*

23 For <sup>t</sup>the wages of sin is death: <sup>u</sup>but the gift of God is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

Note.—The apostle here calls on the Christians at Rome, and on his readers, to declare, what advantages they had acquired in the service of sin. What was the "fruit" produced by those evil actions, of which, as penitents, they were at length ashamed? (Marg. Ref. m, n.—Notes, Jer. 31:18—20. Ez. 16:60—63. 36:31, 32.) They could not but know, that vanity, vexation, disappointment, disgrace, disease, remorse, fear, and sorrow, always attended or followed sinful indulgences; besides the fatal effects caused by them to others; and therefore, if this life alone were considered, they could have no rational inducement to return to them. But, besides all present bad consequences, "the end of these things is death;" and it would be a mere delusion to suppose, that any creed or profession could preserve the habitual transgressor from this condemnation. (Marg. Ref. o.—Notes, 5:12—21.) As "death" is here opposed to "everlasting life;" and ætemporal death is the end of the most godly life, as well as the most ungodly; it is clearly absurd to restrict his meaning to the death of the body: doubtless the apostle meant the future state of final misery, in a total separation from the presence and favor of God, and under his awful wrath and vengeance. condemnation the believer is set at liberty, when "made free from sin;" as the removal of the malefactor's fetters, and the opening of his dungeon, are evidences that his offences are pardoned, and the consequence of his reconciliation. Then, he "becomes a servant of God:" thenceforth he has "his fruit unto holiness;" i. e. the nature and effects of his conduct are holy: this tends to the increasing "sanctification" of his own, and also to promote the general cause of truth and holiness, against that of delusion, sin, and misery; and it terminates in perfect holiness. So that, instead of death, at the end of his course, he is put in possession of everlasting life; of which he had many foretastes, in holy consolations, when serving God in newness of life. (Marg. Ref. p.—Note, John 4:10—15.) But, this happy event of his conduct, is not to be considered as a merited reward. Indeed death, temporal, spiritual, and eternal, is the stipend, or stipulated and deserved "wages of sin," even of every violation of God's law: this every man has earned, or deserved, and every unbeliever will receive. But "eternal life is the gift of God" to those who condemn themselves, and renounce all dependence on their defective and defiled services, to rely entirely on divine grace, through the righteousness and atonement of Jesus Christ: and that holiness, which is the meetness for heavenly happiness, is as much "the gift of God through Christ," as that imputed righteousness which is the believer's title to it. (Marg. Ref. t, u.—Notes, 5:20, 21. 1 John 5:11, 12.)—Thus the apostle closes his argument concerning justification, and sanctification as the seal and evidence of it.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—4.

Self-righteous pride, and antinomian licentiousness, are two fatal rocks, on which immense multitudes are continually wrecked, and between which none but the Holy Spirit can pilot us: and the objections of open enemies, to the doctrines of grace, derive their greatest plausibility from the unholy lives of many professed friends.—The mercy of God is indeed glorified in proportion to the abounding of sin, which is freely pardoned to the penitent; but his justice will be glorified in the deepest condemnation of those, who "continue in sin, that grace may abound." Every true believer abhors the thought of thus perverting the gospel, and despising the riches of divine grace; (Note, 2:4—6.) and could he even be deluded into an opinion, that he might go on in sin with impunity, he would be kept back by a strong aversion from it: for how can he, in whose heart those principles are mortified, which gave rise to his former sinful courses, continue in those practices, in which he now has no pleasure, but which he loathes and dreads? Indeed our baptism may instruct us, in the necessity of thus dying to sin, and being "buried," as it were, from all ungodly and unholy pursuits, and of rising to "walk with God in newness of life:" and unholy professors of Christianity (alas, how numerous are they!) belie and virtually renounce their baptism. They have had the outward sign alone of 'death unto sin, and a new birth unto righteousness;' they have never passed from the family of Satan into that of God; nor have they ever renounced the world, the flesh, and the devil, to believe in Christ, and keep his commandments.

V. 5—15.

If indeed we have been so made "one with Christ," as to stand accepted in his righteousness; we shall certainly have conformity to him in his death and resurrection: and his grace will enable us to "crucify the old man, with his affections and lusts," and excite us to determine on the destruction of "the whole body of sin;" that we may no more serve that hated enemy, which crucified our beloved Lord; nor ever rest satisfied, till it has no place in our souls. Thus, by looking to our crucified, risen, and glorified Redeemer, and believing that we shall live together with him; we should be animated to "reckon ourselves dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God through him."—As our "mortal bodies" will at last be raised immortal and incorruptible, by the almighty power of the Saviour; (Notes, 1 Cor. 15:50—58. Phil. 3:20, 21.) so we should never allow "sin to reign" in them, or obey it in the lusts thereof; but, praying earnestly for help from above, we should refuse to yield any of our senses, or members, to be the instruments of unrighteousness; and seek to have them all devoted to God, and employed in his service; as those who have already entered on that divine and happy life, which we hope to lead to all eternity.—To this we may be encouraged, by the nature of the new covenant. If we be indeed Christians, we are "not under the law," which gives no power, and proposes no mercy; but "under" the "grace" of the gospel: and this ensures to the regenerate and believing the preservation and perfection of that "liberty, with which Christ hath made him free." (Notes, Gal. 5:1—6. 13—15.)

V. 16—23.

The real Christian finds, by experience, that his heart, as well as his state, is made new: he has most cordially changed his master and his work: he remembers that once he was the wretched slave of sin; but he thanks God, that he has both heard, understood, believed, and obeyed the gospel. Thus he found his mind cast into the form of it: and as the same metal becomes a new vessel, when melted and cast into the mould; so he became "a new creature," when being thus "made free from sin he became the servant of righteousness." Notwithstanding, therefore, "the infirmities of his flesh," he aims, and prays to be enabled, to spend all his powers and capacities of body and soul in the service of righteousness, unto increasing holiness; even as he once yielded them to serve his sinful passions, unto abounding iniquity.—Those who now are the servants of God, once were the slaves of sin; and in like manner they who now are the slaves of sin, may become "the servants of God," through the gospel. We ought therefore diligently to use every means with those who are yet unchanged, in dependence on the divine blessing to render them ef-factual; and when the change takes place, we should heartily thank God for it.—We may boldly inquire of sinners, What fruit they gather from their vices? What real good they ever derived from ungodliness and iniquity! We may show them that all men must be ashamed of these things; either in deep repentance here, or in everlasting contempt and misery hereafter: (Note, Dan. 12:2,3.) for “the end of them is death;” and every wise man will consider in what future consequences his present conduct is likely to terminate. Happy then is he, and he alone, who is covered with shame for his past offences, who is set at liberty from sin, and thus hates and dreads it, and who “has his fruit unto holiness and the end everlasting life.”—It is of the Lord’s mercy that we have not all received, as well as deserved, “the wages of sin;” but “thanks be to God” for the inestimable gift of his own Son, to be our Salvation, and of eternal life through him! May we all forego our boasts and renounce our vain-confidences; may we come as condemned criminals, not to buy, merit, or earn the favor of God, “which is life eternal;” but to supplicate him, for Christ’s sake, to bestow it on us as a free gift; that he may have all the glory, both now and for evermore!

CHAP. VII.

The believer’s state, “as dead to the law,” and united to Christ, that he may serve God “in newness of Spirit,” is illustrated by the law concerning marriage, 1—5. Through the depravity of human nature, the moral law, though “spiritual, holy, just, and good,” can only occasion sin and death, 7—15. The painful conflict of those, who “delight in the law of God,” but are not able to keep it, 14—24; and their prospect of deliverance by Christ, 25.

K NOW ye not, <sup>b</sup> brethren, (for I speak <sup>a</sup> to <sup>c</sup> them that know the law,) how that <sup>d</sup> the law hath dominion over a man as long as he liveth?

2 For <sup>e</sup> the woman, which hath an husband, is bound by the law to her husband, so long as he liveth; but if the husband be dead, she is loosed from the law of her husband.

3 So then, <sup>f</sup> if while her husband liveth she be married to another man, she shall be called an adulteress: but if her husband be dead, she is free from that law: so that she is no adulteress, <sup>g</sup> though she be married to another man.

4 Wherefore my brethren, <sup>h</sup> ye also are become dead to the law by <sup>i</sup> the body of Christ; <sup>k</sup> that ye should be married to another, even to him who is raised from the dead; <sup>l</sup> that we should bring forth fruit unto God.

Note.—The apostle had before said, “Sin shall not have dominion over you; for ye are not under the law, but under grace:” (Note, 6:14,15.) and he here proceeds to confirm and illustrate that proposition. In interpreting these verses, the meaning of the word “law” must be first carefully settled. It must be shown, whether the ceremonial law in particular, or the Mosaic dispensation in general; or the moral law, as requiring perfect obedience in order to “justification of life,” be intended. (Note, 3:19,20.) Most expositors explain it either of the ceremonial law, or the Mosaic dispensation; but they do not assign any satisfactory reason, why sin must have dominion over a man, as long as he continued under the ceremonial law, or the Mosaic dispensation; or why deliverance from the law, in this sense, by professing the gospel, should ensure his liberty from that slavery: indeed no such reason can be assigned. No doubt, great numbers, under the Mosaic dispensation, were both justified and sanctified, by the mercy and grace of the new covenant; and their relation to the law did not prevent them from being made “free from sin.” (Note, Ex. 19:5.) On the other hand, immense numbers remain slaves to sin under the Christian dispensation; and their external privileges and profession do not deliver them. (Notes, 2 Cor. 3:7—11. Gal. 4:21—31.) But so long as a man continues “under the law,” as a covenant, and seeks justification by his own obedience; he inevitably continues the slave of sin, in one form or other: because nothing but “the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus” can make any sinner “free from the law of sin and death;” (Note, 8:3,4.) and, on the other hand, every one who is delivered from the law, as a covenant, by living faith in Christ, is, by the “Spirit of life” given to him, delivered from the bondage of sin, which shall never more have dominion over him.—The apostle’s argument, through all the subsequent parts of this chapter, relates exclusively to the moral law, and refers especially to the tenth commandment; as those who explain these verses of the ceremonial law, or the Mosaic dispensation, are constrained to admit: (Notes, 7—12.) and though he speaks in the first three verses of the law, in a more general sense; it should be noticed, that he is only illustrating his main subject by an apt similitude.—“When the apostle particularly meant the ceremonial, in distinction from the moral law, he frequently ‘spoke of it in diminutive terms. (Eph. 2:15. Col. 2:20. Heb. 8:13. 9:10.)... But none of ‘these lessening or distinctive characters of the ‘law are found in this epistle, ... to restrain it to ‘the ceremonial law, in what is said about justification by its works.’ Guise.—These remarks may prepare the way, for that interpretation of this passage, and of the chapter, which, after mature deliberation, I have given.—Many Jewish converts to Christianity resided at Rome, and the apostle, it is probable, more immediately intended these, when he said, “I speak to them that know the law.” But several of the Gentile converts had doubtless got acquainted with the books of Moses. (Marg. Ref. c.) Now, it was well known by them, that the law retained its authority over a man, to enforce obedience, or inflict punishment, “as long as he lived.” In ordinary cases, death alone dissolved the relation between the Jew and the law: yet, in particular instances, the law became dead, and lost its authority to command or condemn a man, through his change of circumstances: and when the Jew became a Christian, and understood his Christian liberty, his relation to the Mosaic dispensation was finally terminated. From this case of a Jew, in respect of the law of Moses, as the condition of the national covenant, (Notes, Ex. 19:5. 24:3,4. Gal. 3:15—18. Heb. 8:7—13. 9:18—23.) they might learn how the matter stood in respect of the moral law, as the condition of the covenant of works. The law respecting marriage in particular would aptly illustrate the subject. The married woman was bound to her husband in the strictest bonds; and, while the moral law forbid adultery, the judicial law condemned the adulteress to death: but this law became dead to her, and she to it, by the death of her husband. If before this, she had been married to another man, the law would have condemned her to an ignominious capital punishment; but after her husband's death, she incurred no penalty by marrying another man. (Marg. Ref. e—g.)—The apostle does not, in this place, state the precepts concerning marriage, under the Christian dispensation; he merely shows, in one particular, how the case stood under the law: he says nothing concerning divorce or polygamy; neither does he intimate, that the man would be an adulterer, who took another wife, while his former was living, and not legally divorced; yet our Lord has taught this. (Notes, Matt. 19:3—9.) It would therefore be foreign to the apostle's design to interpret his words, as meaning that a woman, who had been equitably divorced for consanguinity, which rendered her former marriage a nullity, or for any other cause, would be guilty of adultery, if she married again during her former husband's life: for neither the law of Moses, nor the precepts of Christ, inculcate any such thing.—Now the case of the believer, in respect of the subject under consideration, bore some analogy to that which had been stated. Not only were the Jewish converts "dead to" the Mosaic law, by its virtual abrogation; but all true Christians were become dead to the moral law, as a covenant of works, "by the body of Christ," by his incarnation, obedience, and sacrifice on the cross for their transgressions. (Marg. Ref. h, i. —Note, Eph. 2:14—18.) He having thus answered its demands as their Surety, it had no further power to condemn; but believers were looked upon as if they had fully endured its sentence, and fulfilled its righteousness, by their Surety and Representative. Thus the relation between them and the law, as the condition of a covenant, between God and them, was dissolved, even as marriage is dissolved by the natural or legal death of either party; and this was in order to their being "married to Christ as risen from the dead," that, being united to him, according to the covenant of grace, and made partakers of all his "unsearchable riches," they might, by "the supply of his Spirit," bring forth such fruit in their lives, as bore the holy stamp of God upon it, was meet for his gracious acceptance, and honorable to his name.—It should be remembered, that many (probably most) of the Christians at Rome had been Gentiles, who never were under the Mosaic law; and even the Jewish converts were not, as yet, required to renounce it. This consideration fully proves that no mere change of external state is exclusively meant, as many learned commentators have supposed. (Note, Gal. 2:17—21.)

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—"In the flesh," evidently means an unregenerate state; (Marg. Ref. m.—Notes, 18—21. 8:5—9. John 3:6.) which is the necessary consequence of being under the covenant of works, and destitute of the grace of the gospel. While, therefore, both Jews and Gentiles were in this state, "the motions of sins," or those desires and affections which the law forbid, powerfully exerted themselves, and wrought by the members of the body, or in all the constituent parts of the old man, to produce such thoughts, desires, words, and works, as subjected them to "death" by the sentence of the law; instead of entitling them to "life" as having fulfilled its righteousness. (Marg. Ref. n—q.) But when, by faith in Christ, any of them were delivered from that covenant, and their former relation to the law was dissolved; becoming "dead to it," or it becoming "dead to them," as the wife by the death of her husband, they were brought into a new relation to Christ, and God dealt with them by another covenant. Being therefore now regenerate, and having sure promises of sanctifying grace as well as of pardoning mercy; they were encouraged and enabled to worship and obey God "in newness of spirit," from ingenuous principles according to the spiritual meaning of the precept, in cordial love and gratitude, under the influence of the Holy Spirit; and not merely with external observances, moral or ceremonial, according to the letter of the precept, and the

8 But <sup>z</sup> sin, taking occasion by the commandment, <sup>a</sup> wrought in me all manner of concupiscence. <sup>b</sup> For without the law sin was dead.

Note.—It might be objected to the above statement, that if those who were “under the law” inevitably remained the slaves of sin, and if none could serve God “in newness of spirit,” till they were “dead to the law,” and it to them; surely “the law” and “sin” were in reality the same: and would not this cast a vile aspersion on the holy law of God? (Notes, 1—4. 5:20, 21.) To this objection, the apostle answered, with abhorrence of so blasphemous a thought, by observing, that the law and sin were diametrically opposite to each other; and that the former was suited to discover and detect the latter: (Marg. Ref. x.—Note, 3:19,20.) so that, in his own case, he himself should not have known the sinfulness of his thoughts, motives, inclinations, and actions, but by the law. That exact balance detected the deficiency of his obedience, and that perfect standard showed the obliquity of his heart and life; (Note, Dan. 5:25—28.) as well as proved his sins to be more aggravated and numerous, than he had ever before imagined: yet, at the same time, it contained no provision of mercy or grace for his relief. Thus the most salutary laws of the community shut up the criminal in a dungeon, load him with fetters, and condemn him to death for the contrariety of his conduct to them: but the clemency of the prince alone can give him a pardon and release.—In particular, the apostle observes that, by his natural conscience without the law, he should not have known that “lust,” or coveting, was sinful: he should not have supposed, that, while free from adultery, theft, or murder, the desire of a forbidden indulgence, or an object withheld by Providence, was criminal, even so criminal as to expose him to the curse of the law. (Marg. Ref. y.—Notes, Ex. 20:17. Matt. 5:27,28.) Nay, he should not have felt so many lustings, or covetings, if the very strictness of the commandment, “Thou shalt not covet,” had not given occasion to them. So that “sin,” (his depraved nature spoken of as an agent,) traitorously watching the opportunity of destroying him, “took occasion by the commandment” to excite in his heart “all manner of concupiscence.” The imagination began to rove, and the heart to hanker after forbidden objects; and so he was led to conceive of some greater satisfaction in them, than in those which were not forbidden. (Marg. Ref. z, a.)—That man has no deep knowledge of human nature, or the perverse wickedness of his own heart, who does not observe, or is not conscious, of this irrational propensity, to fancy that there is something exquisitely pleasurable, in what is out of our reach, or prohibited. Indeed it seems natural to expect, that it would be so with the posterity of those, who could be satisfied with no fruit in the garden of God, except that which he had forbidden: amidst the profusion of Eden perhaps that tree had been disregarded, if it had not been prohibited. (Notes, and P. O. Gen. 3:1—6.) We readily observe this propensity in others, especially in our children; though perhaps self-love may make us blind to it in ourselves.—“For without the law sin was dead:” not only the same affections and actions could not have hurt us, if the law had not given sin its condemning power; but the sinful principle lay comparatively in a dead or dormant state; as a frozen serpent is inactive and innocuous, till the warmth enlivens it and it recovers vigor; and then, if provoked, its nature becomes apparent. (Marg. Ref. b.—Note, 8:5—9.) Thus the spiritual precepts and awful sanctions of the law, excite the depravity of the heart by their contrariety to it; as the alkali produces an effervescence by its contrariety to the acid; and so the heart rises in blasphemous enmity to the law, and rushes more impetuously into transgression.—In what sense can this be applied to the ceremonial law, the ordinances of which a carnal mind might readily comply with, provided their relation to the gospel were not perceived? Does the tenth commandment belong to the ceremonial law? Where is the marked transition, from the ceremonial to the moral law, to be found in this discussion? Is not the apostle evidently throughout illustrating one proposition; namely, that “those who are under the law are slaves to sin?” The inconsistency of expositors, who set out with confining the meaning to the ceremonial law, or the Mosaic dispensation; and then glide, either imperceptibly to themselves, or at least without hinting it to their readers, to the most spiritual precept of the moral law, must be obvious to every attentive student: and the perplexity which arises from this source is inexpressible.—“It is surprising to me, that the learned Mr. Locke, and some others after him, should make the sense of the passage to be, “without the law,”” (meaning the law given by Moses,) “sin is dead,” not able to

'hurt me; or, without the law of Moses, which annexes death to transgression, sin is as good as dead, is not able to have its will against me, and bring death upon me. For this is contrary to the apostle's peremptory assertions, that "by one man sin entered into the world and death by sin;" "that sin was in the world until," or all along before, "the law;" and that "death reigned from Adam to Moses." (5:12-14.) How then could it be said, that sin was not able to hurt the apostle, or to bring death on him, or upon any other Jew, without the law of Moses: since "it had reigned unto death" so many hundred years before that law was given; and we are told, that the very heathens, who had only the law of nature, knew the judgment of God, that the transgressions of that law were worthy of death? 12 Wherefore <sup>l</sup>the law is holy; and <sup>m</sup>the commandment holy, and just, and good.

Note.—It seems evident, that the apostle in these verses, and in the subsequent part of the chapter, spoke literally of himself, and his own experience. If he personated another man, why did he not give some intimation of his design? In another place he fairly brought forward the Jew; (Note, 2:17-29.) and ambiguity is no characteristic of his writings. Indeed, I apprehend, that the more humble and spiritual any Christian is, the more clearly will he perceive, that the apostle describes the experience of the true believer, from his first convictions, to his greatest progress in grace during this present imperfect state. His avowed object is to show that the law can do nothing for a sinner, either to justify or sanctify him; and that the believer feels this daily, as long as he lives. "I was," says he, "alive without the law once:"

he was once a Pharisee, ignorant of the spirituality of the law, and only attentive to the outward letter; to the corrupt glosses of the scribes, which were suited to limit and explain away even the literal sense of the command; (Notes, Matt. 5:19-22,33-37,43-48. 15:1-14.) and to ceremonies and traditions: and, having some general decency of character, without any acquaintance with his inward depravity, he concluded that his heart and life were good, and that he was in a state of acceptance with God. (Marg. Ref. c, d.) But when "the commandment came" to his conscience, by the convictions of the Holy Spirit, and he perceived its righteous and extensive requirements, and its severe denunciations: he found the sinful propensities of his heart, which before seemed dormant, rise against it; and every endeavor, to fulfil its precepts, showed him more plainly his inability to do it. "The prohibition of what we desire makes us think the enjoyment of it more sweet and valuable; or at least provokes "the carnal mind, which is not subject to the law of God," to a more fervent lusting after it. ... Sin is in scripture represented as an enemy that seeks our ruin and destruction, and takes all occasions to effect it. '23. ... 1 Pet. 2:11.' Whitby. (Notes, 7,8. 5:20,21.) Thus his former hopes died away; he found himself a helpless sinner under merited condemnation, and became as a dead man, except as the gospel revived him from despondency. (Note, 2 Cor. 5:13-15.) Thus the law, of which the promise was, "The man that doeth these things, shall live in them," which was originally ordained to life for holy creatures, and from which, he, though a sinner, had expected heaven, was "found to be unto death:" even as the law of any country, which secures the lives of honest men, is "found to be unto death" by the murderer or robber. (Marg. Ref. f-h.)—The ceremonial law was not "ordained unto life," except as it pointed out Christ, the Substance of its shadows; and it was found unto death by none, but those who made it an appendix to the covenant of works, and rejected Christ for the sake of it; and this perfectly coincides with the interpretation above given.—Sin, the corruption of fallen nature, being averse to the holy strictness of the moral law, by its extreme deceitfulness, seduced Paul into various transgressions, and thus slew all his self-righteous hopes, and actually brought him under deeper condemnation. Not that the law caused this, or even gave any just occasion for it: but "sin took occasion" from it; as a wicked man takes occasion from a pious discourse, or a friendly admonition, to scoff, blaspheme, or rage the more. (Marg. Ref. k.—Notes, Prov. 9:7-9. 23:9. Matt. 7:6. Acts 18:1-6.) The whole law must therefore be allowed to be perfectly holy, the transcript of the divine character; and each commandment, (especially that which prohibits "coveting,") most "holy," and at the utmost distance from moral evil; most "just," as requiring nothing more than what is righteously due to God and our neighbors; and most "good," as tending to the true welfare of ourselves, our families, the 13 Was <sup>n</sup> then that which is good, made death unto me? God forbid. But <sup>o</sup> sin, that it might appear sin, working death in me by that which is good; that sin by the commandment might become exceeding sinful.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The question here recurred, Was a “good” law made death to those who were under it? Was this its natural tendency and efficacy? (Notes, 5—8.) This conclusion the apostle rejects with detestation. Wholesome food, or a valuable medicine, through a diseased state of the body, or when taken improperly, may “occasion” death, contrary to its general and proper tendency: but poison kills, as a cause, by its native efficacy. The law may occasion death through man’s depravity; but sin is the poison that causes death. It was not therefore the law, “but sin,” which was made death to the apostle. “Sin” took occasion,” from the goodness of the law, to manifest its own deformity, odiousness, and dire malignity, by “working death in him by that which was good,” as an intemperate man murders himself, not by a sword or by poison, but by the wholesome gifts of a bountiful Providence. Thus, through the commandment “sin became exceeding sinful;” that is, the odious and ruinous nature of sin, as well as the sinfulness of the human heart, were most clearly shown; in order that the abounding grace of God might appear the more glorious. 14 For we know that <sup>p</sup> the law is spiritual; <sup>q</sup> but I am <sup>r</sup> carnal, <sup>s</sup> sold under sin.

Note.—The apostle here proceeds to confirm his position.—“We know,” says he, and allow, “that the law is spiritual.” It is not like human laws, which reach only to the outward actions, and take no cognizance of the motives, affections, and thoughts; for God chiefly respects these: (Marg. Ref. Notes, Ex. 20:1. Deut. 6:5. Ps. 51:5,6.) the law requires an entire conformity to the spiritual excellency of the divine perfections, and such a state of the heart, as approves itself to him, who “is a Spirit:” and it allows of nothing but what is done from the most pure and sublime motives, and in perfect love, zeal, gratitude, and delight. Compared with this most holy rule of conduct, the apostle found that he was “carnal, sold under sin:” his nature was perfectly opposite to this spiritual law; and even, after all his attainments in grace, he found himself so very far short of this perfection, and in every respect so unable to attain to it, though he ardently aspired after it; that he seemed comparatively to be “carnal,” and like a man who is sold against his will to a hated master, from whom he can by no means set himself at liberty.

(Marg. Ref. q—s.)—Numbers cannot conceive, that St. Paul could mean this of himself as a confirmed believer; and, finding it to be inseparably connected with what follows, they would explain the whole of an awakened Jew, or some other convinced sinner, who is seeking justification by the “works of the law;” or at most of an unconfirmed believer. But such things are spoken, as are true of none but real Christians; and the whole is actually verified in their experience. A believer cannot willingly sell himself to work wickedness, as Ahab did; (Note, 1 Kings 21:25,26.) nor will he imitate those slaves, who love their master and his service, and refuse liberty when offered to them: (Note, Ex. 21:3,6.) yet, when he compares his actual attainments with the spirituality of the law, and with his own desire and aim to obey it; he sees that he is yet to a great degree “carnal” in the state of his mind, and under the power of evil propensities, from which (like a man sold for a slave,) he cannot emancipate himself. He is “carnal” in exact proportion to the degree, in which he falls short of perfect conformity to the law of God: and he indignantly and reluctantly thus far serves an abhorred master; yet cannot shake off the galling chain, till his powerful and gracious Friend comes to rescue him from it. It is true, this inability lies in the remaining evil of his heart alone; yet, it is a real, but most humiliating hindrance to his serving God, as angels and the spirits of just men made perfect do; or as the Saviour did, who could say, “the prince of this world cometh, and hath nothing in me.” (Notes, John 8:27—29. 14:29—31, v. 31.) To this perfect holiness the zealous believer cannot but aspire; nothing short of it will ever satisfy his “hungering and thirsting after righteousness;” and this proves that in another sense, he is “made free from sin,” that is, set at liberty from its hated dominion, and become the “servant of righteousness.” (Note, 6:16—19.)—As the apostle was far more enlightened and humble than Christians, in general are, doubtless this clog was more uneasy to him, than it is to them; though most of us find our lives at times greatly embittered by it. So that this energetic language, which many imagine to describe an unestablished believer's experience, or even that of an unconverted person, seems to have resulted from the extraordinary degree of St. Paul's sanctification, and the depth of his self-abasement and hatred of sin: and the reason of our not readily understanding him seems to be, because we are so far beneath him in holiness, humility, acquaintance with the spirituality of God's law, and the evil of our own hearts, and in our degree of abhorrence of moral evil. (P. O. Matt. 8:5-13. Note, Eph. 3:8.) In the former part of the chapter, the apostle had spoken in the past tense, "I was alive, &c." (9): but here he uses the present, to which he uniformly adheres in what follows. He had described his state, as a blind proud Pharisee; and the manner in which he became "dead to the law," as to dependence on it for justification: (Note, Gal. 2:17-21.) and here he shows, that even, as a confirmed Christian, all his hope and all his holiness must come from Christ, according to the new covenant. Thus in another place he says, "What things were gain to me, these I counted loss for Christ; yea, doubtless, and I count all things but loss, for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus, &c." (Notes, Phil. 3:1-11, vv. 7-9.)—Some indeed suppose the transition from the experience of the apostle, under his first convictions, to his subsequent conflict with indwelling sin, to be made at the next verse: but the change of tense in this place does not admit of that construction.—In the very same chapter, in which our Lord pronounces Peter "blessed," as a believer, he says, "Thou savorest not the things that be of God, but those that be of men:" (Notes, Matt. 16:17-23.) that is, thou art "carnal" not totally, but in a considerable degree. Thus likewise the apostle addresses the Christians at Corinth as carnal, even when he speaks to them "as babes in Christ." (Note, 1 Cor. 3:1-3.) Humbly to confess, and deeply to lament, that we are thus "carnal and sold under sin," is very far indeed from the disposition and conduct of a willing slave to his lusts: and the readiness, with which numbers of the most eminent believers adopt the apostle's language, shows that it is very suitable to their strong feelings of abhorrence of sin, and of self-abasement. "I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes." (Notes, Job. 1:1. 42:1-9. P. O. 1-6.) "Woe is me! for I am undone: for I am a man of unclean lips." (Note, Is. 6:5. P. O. 1-8.) "My soul cleaveth unto the dust." (Note, Ps. 119:25.) "Surely I am more brutish than any man!" (Note, Prov. 30:2,3.)—Indeed all the complaints of the prevalence of sin, and all the longings and pantings after holiness, and all the earnest cries for pardon, teaching, quickening grace, which pervade the book of Psalms, especially the hundred and nineteenth Psalm, are entirely coincident with this complaint of the apostle, and arise precisely from the same source; a "delight in the law of God;" and a painful consciousness of great remaining want of conformity to it. (Notes, Ps. 119:5. Matt. 5:6.)

16 If then I do that which I would not, † I consent unto the law that it is good.

17 Now then † it is no more I that do it, but † a sin that dwelleth in me.

Note.—The apostle here begins more particularly to enlarge on the conflict, which he daily maintained with the remainder of his original depravity. He was frequently tempted by "the sin that dwelt in him" into such tempers, words, or actions, as he did not approve or allow, in his renewed judgment and affections. He earnestly desired and fully determined, if possible, to perform a perfect obedience to the law of God; but he continually fell short of this: and, while he "hated" and abhorred every kind and degree of sin, he found it impracticable wholly to avoid committing it in work, or word, or thought. In thus doing what he "hated," and desired above all things to shun, he "consented to the law, that it was good;" and as the prevailing bias of his soul was to holiness, he was evidenced by it to be a regenerate man, under the covenant of grace: so that it would not be laid to his charge, in the day of judgment, that he did the evil which he hated, but it would be placed to the account of "the sin, which dwelt in him" as a detested inmate, and which he was not able to expel, though not willing to obey it. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Ps. 66:18,19. 119:113. Phil. 3:12-14.) The apostle certainly did not mean to excuse his sinfulness, as if he might not justly have been condemned for it: but to show that "righteousness could" in no case "be by the law;" and that, by the grace of the gospel, a man's state and character are determined, according to what habitually prevails in his heart and life; notwithstanding impediments and restraints. A wicked man feels some inward opposition to his crimes, from conscience, fear, or shame; and he meets with various obstacles to the gratification of his desires: yet all this is accounted for nothing, while sin habitually prevails in his heart and conduct, and he does not hate it. (Note, Ps. 36:3,4.) A godly man has great hindrances in his holy progress, from in-dwelling sin and outward temptation: yet this is not imputed to him for condemnation, seeing the prevailing state of his heart and tenor of his conduct are ho.y. Thus Judas, in betraying Christ, acted in character, according to the habitual, though concealed, state of his heart: it was "Judas that did it:" but Peter, through sudden temptation, acted out of character, and contrary to the habitual state of his heart, in denying Christ: it was "not he, but the sin that dwelt in him;" that is, according to the gracious tenor of the new covenant.

18 For I know <sup>b</sup> that in me (that is, <sup>c</sup> in my flesh,) dwelleth no good thing: <sup>d</sup> for to will is present with me, but how to perform that which is good, I find not.

19 For the good that I would, I do not; but the evil which I would not, that I do.

20 Now if I do that I would not, <sup>e</sup> it is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me.

21 I find then <sup>f</sup> a law, that when I would do good, <sup>g</sup> evil is present with me.

Note.—The apostle "knew, that in him," as a fallen creature, apart from regenerating grace, "no good thing," but sin and only sin was found; though its actings were more specious at one time than another. (Notes, Gen. 6:5. Jer. 17:9,10. Matt. 15:15—20.) It is evident from the limitation, "that is, in my flesh," that he spoke as a believer, who had grace, as well as "sin, dwelling in him:" for by "flesh," in this connexion, he does not mean the body as distinct from the soul, but "the old man," or unregenerate human nature, as the subsequent parts of the argument fully prove: and this nature, derived from fallen Adam, never concurs with the Holy Spirit in regeneration, or with the new man afterwards, but always strives against both. (Marg. Ref. b. c.—Notes, 5,6. 8:1—13. John 3:6. Gal. 5:6—18.) The apostle became more deeply acquainted with this humiliating truth by his experience subsequent to conversion, than he had been before. Formerly he perhaps supposed, that a little good disposition, or moral ability to holiness, was in man; but this was now experimentally disproved. As regenerate, he had indeed an habitual willingness to obey the law of God, and to accomplish the good required by it; but his corrupt nature, though dethroned and crucified, made such constant opposition to this, that he could by no means perform what he aimed at. (Marg. Ref. d.—Note, Phil. 2:12,13.) So that, in fact, he did not fulfil that measure of good, which he was habitually desirous of doing, but in every thing fell short of his aim: and he was also frequently doing the evil, in some measure or respect, which he was habitually most bent upon avoiding. Now, as he was thus constantly baffled and obstructed, in his earnest persevering desires and endeavors to obey the law; it was evident that it was not properly he, as a believer, who did this; but the traitor and enemy that lodged within his heart. (Note, 15—17.) He was obliged, contrary to his habitually prevalent inclinations, to live under a sort of necessity of being sinful; and he could only persist in maintaining the conflict with his inward enemies, without being able entirely to extirpate them. (Note, Ps. 119:5. 2 Cor. 7:1.) For indeed, he found, by painful experience, that there was "a law" imposed upon him, in his present state of warfare, that, when he was most desirous of "doing good, evil was present with him," to interrupt, intrude, baffle, discourage, and defile him. (Marg. Ref. f, g.)—Let any man who knows his own heart, and the spirituality of the law of God, compare his actual conduct, comprising his thoughts, motives, affections, words, and works, during any given time with his purposes, prevailing desires, and earnest persevering prayers: let him take that one duty, which he especially aims to perform most perfectly, or that wrong temper, or evil propensity, which he most longs to rectify or extinguish: let him examine himself very exactly in these respects every night; and he will surely find, that he cannot but be a sinner still, and subjected to "a law, that when he would do good, evil is present with him." God has wise reasons for permitting this to be so, especially to give us a deeper sense of the malignity of sin, and our own deep depravity, in order to commend the grace of the gospel: but those who are most acquainted with the excellency of the law, and most diligently aim in every thing to obey it, will be most deeply conscious that the case is actually thus with them, whatever their opinion may be of those, whom they suppose to be more eminent Christians.—This opposition to sin, however, though in a measure unsuccessful; and this humiliating and distressing disappointment, respecting the object of their most ardent desires; must not be confounded with the willing slavery of sin, and the convenient excuse of in-dwelling depravity. The apostle "daily exercised himself to have a conscience void of offence towards God and man:" and could call others to witness, "how holily, and justly, and unblamably, he had behaved among them." Yet this was not inconsistent with his being deeply humbled in the sight of God, by the consciousness of wandering thoughts in prayer, want of fervor, of love and gratitude to God, of zeal for his glory, and of enlarged good will to men; the rising of evil tempers, the intrusion of vain imaginations, and the intermixture of selfish motives. (Notes, Acts 24:10—21, v. 16. 1 Thes. 2:9—12.) All these are "sin," and as such hated and abhorred, in proportion to the degree of a man's sanctification: (Note, Ps. 119:113.) yet no mere man on earth, after all possible diligence, watchfulness, fasting, and prayer, could truly say, that, in these respects, he was perfectly free from sin, in his worship and obedience. So that, even the person who is not conscious of at any time neglecting one duty, or committing one actual transgression, in word or deed, (which is at least a most uncommon case,) yet, aspiring to be holy as an angel, or as Jesus Christ was, will very painfully feel, that "he doeth not the things that he would;" and will "find a law, that when he would do good, evil is present with him;" and the more spiritual the services are in which he engages, the greater clog and hindrance will it be to him. Had the apostle intended to describe the case of any of those, however distinguished, who habitually live in sin, against the conviction of their own judgment and conscience; it cannot be conceived, that he would not, with his usual concise energy, have reprobated their conduct, as far more aggravated, than that of ignorant and thoughtless transgressors: but nothing of this kind appears; on the contrary, he leads on the character, which he is describing, to exultation and joy in believing. (Notes, 22—25. 8:1, 2.)

'I really could not refuse him.'—'I could not, as I was circumstanced, do otherwise.' So that free-agency and responsibility still remain the same notwithstanding this "law, that when we would do good, evil is present with us."

22 For <sup>h</sup> I delight in the law of God after <sup>i</sup> the inward man:

23 But I see <sup>k</sup> another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, <sup>l</sup> and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members.

24 O <sup>m</sup> wretched man that I am! <sup>n</sup> who shall deliver me from * the body of this death?

25 I <sup>o</sup> thank God, through Jesus Christ our Lord. <sup>p</sup> So then with the mind I myself serve the law of God; but with the flesh the law of sin.

Note.—By "the inward man," the apostle must mean the soul, as renewed by divine grace. He alone uses the term; and he uses it concerning believers only. (Notes, 2:25—29. 2 Cor. 4:13—18, v. 16. Eph. 3:14—19, v. 16.) The affections and faculties of the soul in fallen man, are more opposite to the law of God, than the bodily appetites; nay, the latter are not sinful, except as improperly gratified through the lusts of the heart. (Notes, 6:12, 13, 16—19. Gal. 5:16—21. Jam. 1:13—15.) But to approve, and even "delight in, the law of God," according to the habitual judgment and affections of the soul, through a kind of spiritual sympathy, or congeniality of heart with its most strict and holy requirements, must be peculiar to the regenerate; nay, it must imply a high degree of sanctification. This the apostle had attained to: yet he "found another law in his members," the constituent parts of the old man, (Note, 6:5—7.) which continually enjoined a conduct, or suggested inclinations, contrary to "the law of his mind;" and this tended to "bring him into captivity to the law of sin," and in some cases for a time it produced that effect. This painful conflict was more grievous to him, than all his other trials: so that he was led to bemoan himself as "a wretched man," who was constrained, by a kind of necessity which he found it impossible to escape from, to be and to do what he most abhorred. This extorted a bitter complaint, which neither bonds, nor stripes, nor tortures, could have done; and, with a sort of holy impatience and eagerness, he exclaimed, "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" (Notes, 8:18—23. 2 Cor. 12:7—10.) For the sin "which dwelt in him" clogged his motions, offended his senses, and was a nuisance to him, as a spiritual man; even as if any one should be forced to drag about with him a putrefying corpse, as, by a refinement of cruelty, some have been sentenced to do. He found by experience that he could not deliver himself; and the law, instead of delivering him, seemed to make the case still worse: (Notes, 9—12. 8:3, 4.) but this made him the more fervently to thank God, for the method of salvation revealed through Jesus Christ; which gave him earnest and sure hopes, of final and complete deliverance from this enemy, and a triumphant victory in this spiritual warfare.—"So then," says he, "I myself with my mind" (my prevailing judgment, affections, and purposes, as a regenerate man,) "serve and obey the law of God:" but with the flesh, the carnal nature, the remains of depravity, "I serve the law of sin," or that "law which wars against the law of my mind." Before conversion, the whole man serves this law, with a very feeble opposition from conscience, fear, and shame: but, at length, the usurper is dethroned, and grace reigns in the heart. Yet still the usurper lurks in the kingdom, reigns over his own party, makes war, creates immense disturbance, and gains temporary advantages; but he is hated, opposed, proscribed, and shall die. (Note, Gal. 5:22—26.)—Delight in the law of God. (22) "This is so sure a trace of real piety, and is represented in scripture as in this view so decisive; that if it be supposed a true representation of a character, we must surely allow it 'to have been that of a truly good man.' Doddridge. It is especially spoken of Christ; and of the man after God's own heart, as the type of him. (Notes, Ps. 40:6—8. 112:1. 119:47, 48, 92, 97—100, 111.) It is the effect of "the law being written in the heart;" and it is the direct opposite of "the carnal mind, which is enmity against God; for that is not subject to the law of God, nor indeed can be." (Notes; 8:5—9. Jer. 31:31—34. Heb. 8:7—13. 10:5—18.) "Consenting to the law that it is good;"

itual law of God; hating all evil; loving all good; and being deeply distressed at not being able to do the good which is loved, are all exclusively peculiar to the regenerate, and widely different from a heathen’s saying in one particular: ‘I see and approve the better, but follow the worse;’ which in fact any man might say. ‘Araspas’ (in Xenophon) ‘complains of two ‘souls contending within him, which contains ‘an agreeable illustration of this paragraph.’
Doddridge. But in the case of Araspas, the conflict was between ambition and sensual indulgence, equally corrupt principles; not between “delight in the holy law of God,” and the opposition of remaining depravity to earnest endeavors after perfect conformity to it.
Indeed, such a conflict as is here described, must exist where sin is hated, and “the law of God delighted in,” till holiness is perfected.
“Abhorrence of evil” must increase in proportion to the love of God and holiness; so that the least degree of evil rising in the heart, and escaping from the lips, in some passionate or vain word, will necessarily more grieve and burden an eminent saint, than perhaps the grossest crimes did before his conversion: even as a speck of dirt gives more uneasiness to a very cleanly person, than the most squalid filthiness does to those, who are used to live in it as their element. (Note, Ez. 11:17—20.)
—There is, therefore, no need to have recourse to such unnatural expedients in expounding this chapter, as to imagine, that when the apostle said, “I myself,” he meant some other person of a widely different character; or the whole family of Abraham, before and under the law. However these theories have been sanctioned by eminent names, they go upon suppositions, for which the scripture gives not the least ground; and which are wholly unprecedented and unparalleled, in the writings of any good author, sacred or profane. No doubt, numbers have perverted the words of the apostle: and it is fairly allowed, that no man, who is not himself engaged in this conflict, can clearly understand his meaning, or fully enter into those feelings which dictated his energetic language. But, as to the former case, those who want an excuse for sin, “wrest the other scriptures also to their own destruction:”
(Note, 2 Pet. 3:14—16.) and as to the latter,
“the secret of the LORD is with them that fear him;” and “the heart knoweth his own bitterness, and a stranger doth not intermeddle with his joy.” (Notes, Ps. 25:14. Prov. 14:10.) It cannot be expected, that a man, who never saw war, could enter into the feelings, and fully understand the ardent language, of an experienced soldier, when he related all his conflicts, dangers, hardships, terrors, narrow escapes, victories, and triumphs. But I apprehend, that many pious persons exclude themselves from the rich source of instruction and consolation, in their warfare, provided for them in this chapter, either from fear lest others should pervert it to bad purposes; or because men of great name have affected to reprobate the evidently obvious interpretation, and have tried to force some other meaning upon the words, of which it is impossible they can admit. (*Notes, Ps. 119:81—83, 97—100,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS

V. 1—6.

We stand in such a relation to the holy law of God, as the rule of our present conduct and future judgment, that none but he who formed the union can dissolve it: and, unless “we become dead to the law by the body of Christ,” renouncing all expectations from it, that we may be united to Him, who “died for our sins and rose again for our justification,” we must inevitably abide under the dominion of sin, and the curse of the law forever.—If, however, we are thus delivered, it is not in order to our being “lawless;” (*Note, 1 Cor. 9:19—23, v.
21.*) but that the Spirit of Christ dwelling in us may write the law in our hearts, and enable us to bring forth the fruits of holy obedience, to the glory of God. Indeed this is absolutely necessary, in order to our serving God with that “newness of spirit,” which the law itself demands; by enjoining the “love of God with the whole heart,” and the “love of our neighbor as ourselves;” for sanctifying grace comes only by the new covenant, without which we fallen creatures must continue “in the flesh;”
and our natural “concupiscence” will work against the law “to bring forth fruit unto death;” so that nothing more than a formal obedience to the outward letter of any precept, can be performed by us, without the renovating, new creating grace of the new covenant.
(Notes, 2 Cor. 5:17. Eph. 2:4—10, v. 10.)

V. 7—13.

It is not the fault of the holy law of God, that it cannot justify or sanctify a sinner: nay, it is the necessary effect of its perfection; by which it detects and condemns the least degree of evil, and leaves the transgressor to merited ruin without help or remedy: and the better the law is, the more righteous is the doom of those who break it. We should therefore be very careful while showing the impossibility of salvation by the law, to avoid all expressions which so much as seem derogatory to it. On the contrary, we ought to bear decided testimony to its equity, spirituality, and excellency; and show that it is, on that very account, suited to convince the sinner of the danger of his case, and even to render it still worse, so long as he foolishly cleaves to the law, and depends on it. For no man could expect to be either justified or sanctified by a broken law, or according to a forfeited covenant, were he not ignorant of the law, and of himself as compared with it: so that the proudest Pharisee on earth would from his towering height of vain confidence, sink into despair; if the commandments of God were once discovered to his soul, in all their spirituality and excellency, without a correspondent view of the salvation of Christ. Ten thousand unobserved transgressions would stand in dread array against him; his former foibles and infirmities, as he thought them, would appear desperate rebellion, ingratitude, and enmity; his admired duties would appear loathsome, through pride, selfishness, and hypocrisy; and the dormant lusts of his heart, which secular motives or carnal hopes had restrained, would burst forth into enmity against God, disdain subjection to his law, "work in him all manner of concupiscence," and concur in slaying his hope and his soul. (Note, John 16:8—11.) Thus the law, which was "ordained unto life, would be found to be unto death;" through the deceitfulness of sin, and the unsuspected and desperate wickedness of his heart; "working death in him by that which was good," and making manifest its own "exceeding sinfulness." Thus a proper knowledge of the holy law of God is the two-edged sword, which gives the death-wound both to self-righteousness, and to antinomianism: for it is perfectly fit to be the rule of our duty, to be written in our hearts, and obeyed in our lives, for the very same reasons on account of which it cannot justify or save us.

V. 14—25.

Every believer knows a little of the things spoken of by the apostle in these verses, when he first flees for refuge to the hope of the gospel; but his subsequent experience gives him still further insight into them. He is now in a measure "spiritual;" yet, in comparison with the spiritual requirements of the law, and the best desires of his heart, he must confess that he "is carnal and sold under sin;" and he groans under that clog and those fetters, which, as it were, chain him to the earth, and prevent him from mounting heavenward as he longs to do. "He consents to the law that it is good," yea, "he delights in it after the inward man;" he would do the good it requires; he allows of no violation of it; he wants no change in it, but longs to have his heart brought into a perfect conformity to it; he abhors all sin, and would serve God as angels do; he watches, prays, strives, and uses every means for this purpose: yet, after persevering in this course, perhaps during a long course of years, he finds that he cannot attain to perfection. (Note. Phil. 3:12—14.) Still he sins against his own allowance; he does what he hates, and longs to be preserved from: his will often changes, like the weather-cock with the wind: that which on his knees he most ardently prayed against, and dreaded more than pain or death, in the hour of temptation he is betrayed into: his resolutions melt like the firm ice before the noon-day sun, and he is counteracted in obeying the dictates of "the law of his mind," by "the law of sin," pervading both body and soul; so that he cannot perform that which he is most earnestly willing to do. (Notes, Matt. 26:30—35, 40, 41, 69—75.) His views of the beauty of holiness and the excellency of the law, and of his own obligations to obedience, and his pantings after perfect purity, increase as "he grows in grace:" so that he seems further from the mark than ever, when at the height of his attainments in this present world. He is more deeply convinced as he proceeds, that "in him," as a fallen sinner, "dwelleth no good thing;" that, from depraved nature, evil alone can proceed; that the law can only condemn him; and that "none 'but Jesus can do helpless sinners good.'" This conflict sometimes renders him weary of life, and even impatient of living: he could be content to suffer, but he can scarcely bear the thought of continuing a self-aborred sinner: he groans out frequently, "O wretched man, that I am!" while he drags about with him the detested "body of sin and death," from which he can obtain no deliverance: and did he not firmly trust in the mercy and grace of God through Jesus Christ, his case would be most deplorable. But, with this hope, prospect, and support, he manfully sustains the conflict; he rejoices amidst his humiliations; his groans and tears are mingled with hallelujahs, and his conscious guilt and depravity render the Redeemer's love, and complete salvation, doubly precious to his soul. His very anguish from such a source is the pledge of his felicity: having wrestled and prevailed for the blessing, and seen the face of Emmanuel in peace, he goes on his way halting. (P. O. Gen. 32:13—32.) His complaints, yea, his unhallowed and deeply repented sins, are preparing him for singing more loudly and sweetly, "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain:" and, like the dissonance attending on the tuning of a musical instrument, make way for more delightful melody; when patience shall have had its perfect work, and he shall have "overcome by the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of his testimony." (Notes, 8:32—39. Rev. 7:13—17.) In the mean time, it shall be graciously pleaded in his behalf, that "it was not he, but sin that dwelt in him."—But, if a man speak on this subject with indifference or with satisfaction; if "sin dwelling in him" be the excuse for crimes committed, without remorse or godly sorrow; if he "allow the evil, and desire not the good," presuming that he has all things in Christ; if, instead of consenting to the goodness of the law, condemning himself, and loathing his sins, he depreciates the law and extenuates his own guilt; if his utmost willingness be to escape hell at any rate, without longing to be holy according to the spiritual and good law of God; if he do not "delight in it after the inward man," nor serve it with the prevailing desire of his mind, but willingly "serve the law of sin:" then doubtless he is "without Christ," whose name he profanes; he is under the law which he hates; and, his presumptuous confidence and quietness only prove, that he is given over to "a strong delusion to believe a lie." Nor does this much disputed and abused chapter more evidently condemn the hope of the proudest Pharisee on earth, than it does that of such a professor of evangelical truth.

CHAP. VIII.

Those who are in Christ, and walk after the Spirit, are free from condemnation, &c. The carnal mind, and the spiritual mind distinguished, so that only are the children of God, who have the Spirit of Christ, are "led by the Spirit," and mortify the flesh, &c. "The Spirit of adoption" testifies with their spirit, and marks them as children and heirs of God; though now exposed to suffering, &c. The creation, through man's sin, is subject to vanity, and waits for deliverance at "the manifestation of the children of God," &c. who "groan being burdened," and are saved in hope, and patiently expect deliverance, &c. the Holy Spirit aiding their prayers, and thus rendering them acceptable, &c. All things work together for the good of those who love God, as "called according to his purpose," which springs from their predestination to life, &c. and is secured by the death, resurrection, and intercession of Christ, &c. Nothing shall separate them from the love of God through Christ, &c.

THERE is therefore now a no condemnation to them which are b in Christ Jesus, c who walk not after the flesh, but after the spirit.

2 For d the law of e the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus f hath made me free from g the law of sin and death.

Note.—The apostle had shown, that the believer, being earnestly desirous of obeying the holy law of God, was graciously accepted in Christ; and his failures were ascribed to "sin dwelling in him," against his habitual and prevalent inclination, and so not imputed to him; and he here proceeds more fully to state this privilege. (Notes, 7:15—25.) While men continue "under the law," as a covenant, every failure is imputed to them for condemnation; but when they "become dead to the law," and one with Christ, they are "in him" by faith, as their Refuge from day to day; and there is no condemnation for them. All their past sins are blotted out; they are fully justified; and, continually exercising repentance, and faith in his blood and righteousness, their lamented transgressions and deficiencies are pardoned. Thus they are preserved from condemnation, and shall be to the end, and for ever. (Marg. Ref. a, b.—Notes, 32—39. 4:6—8. Is. 54:15—17. John 5:24—27. 10:26—31.) Their character and conduct likewise distinguish them: for, notwithstanding their painful conflict with indwelling sin, they do "not walk" after the dictates of corrupt nature, but are habitually influenced by the new principle, communicated in regeneration: for "that which is born of the Spirit, is spirit." (Marg. Ref. c.) Corrupt nature, "the sin which dwelleth in them," as "the law of sin and death," (Note, 7:22—25.) once commanded their willing service; but regenerating grace, by "the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus," and by means of the gospel, has dethroned the usurper sin, and made them free from his law, by efficaciously inducing a contrary conduct. (Marg. Ref. e—g.—Notes, 6:16—23. John 8:30—36. 2 Cor. 3:17, 18.) So that, though the remaining power of sin greatly harasses them, and in some instances prevails; yet, on the whole, they are enabled successfully to resist its authority, and to "walk at liberty" in obedience to God's commandments.—Some explain "the law of the Spirit of life," of the doctrine of the gospel, through which the Spirit is communicated, rather than of his commanding influence in the believer's soul: but the latter is the more exact contrast to the "law of sin and death," from which he is by divine grace effectually set at liberty.—"To be in Christ," says M. Le Clerc, 'is often used by St. Paul, for being a Christian. ... but if he means only Christians by profession, or by only being members of the Christian church; this will by no means agree with this place, or any other of like nature: since freedom from condemnation and other benefits conferred on us by Jesus Christ, will not follow our being Christians in this sense; but upon a lively faith in Christ, our union to him by the Spirit, and our being so in him as to become new creatures. (9. 2 Cor. 5:17. Gal. 5:6.) ... The Spirit of Christ giving me a new life, is now another law, or rule of my actions, freeing me from the motions and power of sin, to which I was subject whilst under the law; and from the death to which that subjected me.' Whitby.—They who "are in Christ," are true Christians; "they walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit;" this describes their character: and it is their grand privilege, that "there is no condemnation for them." (Notes, John 14:18—20. 15:2—8. 1 Cor. 1:26—31. 2 Cor. 5:17. Gal. 3:26—29. Phil. 3:8—11.)

4 That m the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us, n who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit.

Note.—The good and perfect law of God was "weak through the flesh," or by means of man's depravity: so that it was "impossible" for it to bring man to holiness or liberty, any more than to justify him: even as the most salutary laws of the land cannot make men honest. They can only declare how they ought to act, and denounce penalties against transgressors; but they cannot change the heart: and therefore men's impetuous passions break through the feeble restraint, without regard to consequences, as the vehement torrent of a swollen river breaks through or overflows the mound, which was placed to impede its course. (Marg. Ref. h.) As therefore, the law was wholly inadequate to man's necessity; God was pleased, in infinite mercy, to send his own Son, to assume our nature, and appear "in the likeness of sinful flesh." Though free from sin, he became subject to those infirmities, to which through sin we are exposed; he was accused of many crimes, and "numbered with transgressors;" and he was punished by the Father, as our Surety, as if he had been the greatest of sinners. Thus he was appointed "for sin," or "for a sin-offering;" that God, having "condemned sin in the flesh," and shown his abhorrence of it, by the sufferings of his Son in our flesh, might pardon and justify the believer's person, and execute the sentence of condemnation on his corrupt nature, by its crucifixion and destruction; (Marg. Ref. i.—1.) that, as the consequence of this, through his mercy and grace, even the very "righteousness" required by "the law," might be fully written in our hearts, and habitually, in all its parts, performed in our lives, though too imperfectly to justify us; and that, hereafter we might be perfectly conformed to the holy law, in its substantial requirement of perfect love to God and his creatures, and obey it fully for evermore. (Marg. Ref. n, o.)—Many expositors explain this of Christ, as One with his people, having fulfilled the righteousness of the law in their stead; and of its imputation to those, who walk after the Spirit. But the former sense seems more obvious, and best to answer the apostle's design; who was proving, that deliverance from the law as a covenant was necessary, in order to our obeying the law as a rule. (Notes, 7:5,6. Gal. 2:17—21.) 'Sanctification, begun in us, 'is the sure evidence of our union with Christ; 'which is the richest fruit of a holy life.' Beza.—The completion, however, of sanctification seems especially intended. [Practical Observations.]

Note.—The discrimination of character, before referred to, is here more fully stated. "The flesh," in this connexion, cannot mean the body, as opposed to the soul: for "out of man's heart proceed adulteries, fornications, and drunkenness;" and, on the other hand, "pride, envy, hatred, are works of the flesh." (Marg. Ref. o.—Notes, Matt. 15:15—20. Gal. 5:19—21.) That wickedness, the seat of which is immediately in the soul, is more contrary to the image and glory of God, than that in which the body seems more concerned: but indeed the body is no more than the instrument, and the soul is the agent, in every sin. (Note, 6:12,13.) The soul of an ungodly man is not "spiritual," but carnal; "that which is born of the flesh is flesh." (Note, John 3:6.) By "the flesh" we must, therefore, understand corrupt nature, as derived from Adam to all his posterity: and perhaps this term is used, because the soul is become the caterer to man's animal appetites, as well as depraved in all other respects; so that the whole man is, as it were, immersed and sunk in the flesh. They therefore who are "born after the flesh," but not "after the Spirit," and who go after the leadings of the flesh, "mind the things of the flesh:" they are sagacious about them; they choose, desire, pursue, savor, and delight in them: they seek their happiness in the riches, pleasures, honors, and perishing vanities of the world; or in things of an unholy nature, or in things which must be left at death, and which bear no relation to heavenly felicity. About these, their abilities, imaginations, contrivance, and time are employed; and they give them a decided preference to "spiritual things," in their habitual judgment and conduct. But those who are "born of the Spirit," and walk after the leadings of the new and spiritual nature, understand, choose, pursue, relish, and supremely value such things as pertain to the spiritual and divine life, and such as will endure for ever. The favor of God, communion with him, renewal to his image, and a life spent to his glory, chiefly occupy their imaginations, desires, plans, and pursuits; and have the pre-eminent place in their choice and conduct, notwithstanding all the opposition from indwelling sin. (Marg. Ref. p, q.—Notes, 1,2. 2 Cor. 4:18—18. Col. 3:1—4.) This habitual prevalence stamps the character, as carnal or spiritual: so that, if a man be "carnal," in the prevailing judgment, temper, and affections of his mind, he is under condemnation, dead in sin, and meet for destruction: but if he be "spiritual," in the habitual, prevailing temper of his soul, he is evidently alive to God, and at peace with him; and the spiritual mind is, in proportion as it prevails, the very essence of life and peace. (Marg. Ref. r.—Note, 7:13,14.) The importance of this distinction is manifest, “because the carnal mind is enmity against God:” man’s apostasy originated in his preferring the satisfaction to be found in the creatures through disobedience, to the felicity to be enjoyed in God by obedience. This is in fact the universal idolatry: and men thus preferring self-satisfaction, and created good, to the favor and service of God, not only rebel against him, but become enemies to him, and “haters” of him. For, his holy law demanding their whole heart, and forbidding their favorite pursuits; and all his perfections being engaged to execute vengeance on transgressors; “the carnal mind,” disdaining control, being wholly averse from the service of God, and bent on sinful indulgence, rises in enmity against his authority, precepts, threatenings, power, and perfections. Therefore, “the carnal mind is not subject to the divine law, and indeed cannot be;” it is morally unable to do any thing but revolt against it, and refuse obedience to it. (Marg. Ref. t—x.—Notes, 7:7—12.) An enemy may be reconciled, a carnal man may become spiritual; but “enmity” in the abstract cannot be reconciled, and therefore the carnal mind must be crucified and destroyed: (Notes, 6:5—7. Gal. 5:22—26.) and, as no rational creature of God can please him, who refuses subjection to the holy law; it is evident, that unregenerate men “cannot please God,” in any of their services, by whatever name they are called. Thus evangelical religion is equally remote from self-righteousness, which cleaves to the law as a covenant; and to antinomianism, which rejects it as a rule: for, not being subject to the law, men “cannot please God.” (Marg. Ref. y, z.)—“But,” says the apostle, “Ye are not in the flesh, but in the spirit;” regenerate and spiritual, and therefore willingly, though not perfectly, subject to the law, “if so be, the Spirit of God dwell in you:” but if any man, Jew, Gentile, or nominal Christian, remain destitute of the sanctifying Spirit of Christ, he certainly does not belong to him, as one of his accepted disciples, and, dying in that state, he must perish as an enemy of God. (Marg. Ref. c, d.)—If “the flesh” be explained of the body, as distinguished from the soul, or spirit; it follows, beyond all doubt or evasion, that no man can “please God,” while he lives in this world; and also that the Romans were disembodied spirits, which is palpably absurd: yet the interpretation of other scriptures, concerning the flesh and spirit, by many learned men, unavoidably leads to this absurdity. Nor is it less unreasonable and unscriptural to aver, that living under the Mosaic dispensation was “being in the flesh;” and professing the gospel, especially if miraculous powers were vouchsafed, was being in the spirit. (Notes, Matt. 7:21—23. 1 Cor. 13:1—3.) Yet these seem the only ways, by which the above plain and natural interpretation can possibly be evaded. (Notes,

11 But if the Spirit of <sup>i</sup> him that raised up Jesus from the dead, dwell in you; <sup>k</sup> he that raised up Christ from the dead, shall also quicken your <sup>l</sup> mortal bodies, <sup>m</sup> by his Spirit that <sup>n</sup> dwelleth in you.
Note.—(Note, 5—9.) If the “Spirit of Christ dwell” in a man, “Christ” himself is “in him,” by his power and influence, and by his image renewed in him. In this case, though the body is mortal, and must soon die, because of the disobedience of Adam, and the man’s personal transgressions: yet “the spirit is life,” has life abiding in it, the soul is alive to God; and has begun its holy felicity, which shall endure for ever, through “the righteousness” of the second Adam in whom it is interested. So that when the body drops into the dust, the soul, being perfectly delivered from sin, will enter heaven: and the almighty God, who raised Jesus from the dead, will raise the mortal body also, incorruptible and glorious, by the omnipotence of his indwelling Spirit, who will not finally leave his temple mouldering in the dust. (*Marg. Ref.—Notes, 3,4. John 4:10—15, v. 14. 11:20—27, vv. 26, 27. 2 Cor. 4:13—18. 5:5—8. (Note, 1 Cor. 15:50—54.) Several readers may be aware, that another interpretation has been given of these verses, especially by the celebrated Mr. Locke, who explains quickening the mortal body, by sanctifying the immortal soul! But the various, and often absurd and unnatural interpretations, given to several passages in these chapters by some eminently learned men, would require far more time and room, particularly to notice them, and make remarks on them, than the nature of this publication can admit of. In general, when the interpretation is plausible, and supported by probable reasons, the author thinks it incumbent on him to notice it, in one way or other: but when, on careful investigation, it appears to him, that this is not the case; he is contented to pass it over in silence. He believes, that few, who have impartially considered the subject, will refuse to join him in the following verdict, concerning Mr. Locke's interpretation: 'He hath said nothing of weight against this sense.' Whitby. That is, against the sense above given of the passage.—In no book, which the author has read, does the pride of human reason opposing the express testimonies of God, and striving to wrest them from their obvious meaning, appear so prominent, as in most parts of the great Mr. Locke's exposition of St. Paul's epistles.

13 For if <sup>o</sup> ye live after the flesh, ye shall die: <sup>p</sup> but if ye <sup>q</sup> through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live.

Note.—As death and all misery originated from man's preferring his own inclinations to the will of God; and as all felicity is communicated by the renewal of the soul to holiness; so Christians should not consider themselves to be "debtors to the flesh," though it still lives and works in them. They have already ruined themselves, by complying with its suggestions; and they can owe it nothing, now that Christ has rescued them from merited destruction. (Marg. Ref. n.) But we thus become debtors to an immense amount unto him and his grace. Our debt of sin as paid, by the death of Christ on the cross for us, and so freely pardoned to us, becomes a debt of grateful love: and our past neglect and sin render us the more indispensably bound to do what we possibly can for his glory, the good of our brethren, and of our own souls also. For indeed, if any habitually live according to its corrupt lustings, they will certainly perish in their sins, notwithstanding their profession of the gospel; but, on the other hand, if, through the influences of "the Holy Spirit," and according to the tendency of the new nature, they deny, subdue, and proceed to extirpate their sinful lusts; and so to mortify those inclinations and affections, which thence arise, they prove themselves "alive to God through Christ," and their spiritual life will abound till perfected in eternal happiness. (Marg. Ref. o, p.—Note, 6:21—23.)—The natural appetites of the body need only to be moderated, regulated, and subordinated; but the carnal desires "of the body of sin and death," the "old Adam," "the flesh with its affections and lusts," must be extirpated, and all its actings terminated. (Notes, 6:5—7. 7:

22—25. 1 Cor. 9:24—27. Col. 2:11,12. 1 Pet. 2:11.) This must be done by the Holy Spirit, working in us both "to will" and "to do," what God commands; (Note, Phil. 2:12,13.) yet we are to do it through him, and by dependence on him, which is energetically enforced by the words; "if ye, through the Spirit, &c." 14 For as many as are <sup>r</sup> led by the Spirit of God, <sup>s</sup> they are the sons of God.

17 And <sup>a</sup> if children, then heirs; <sup>b</sup> heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ; <sup>c</sup> if so be that we suffer with him, that we may be also glorified together. [Practical Observations.]

Note.—Regeneration by the Holy Spirit prepares the heart for receiving Christ by living faith; and communicates a new and divine life to the soul, though in a feeble state, as that of "a new-born babe." (Note, 1 Pet. 2:1—3, v. 2.) Believing in Christ, we become "the children of God" by adoption also. (Notes, John 1:10—13. Gal. 3:26—29.) Therefore all they, and they only, who are led by the Spirit, are "the children of God." (Marg. Ref. r, s.—Note, Gal. 5:16—18.) The Holy Spirit leads a man into the knowledge of God in Christ Jesus, and of his own heart; into humble repentance, faith in Christ, holy love, communion with God, and delight in his worship and commandments: on the other hand, he leads him away from vanity and iniquity, from vice and ungodliness, from pride and discord; (Note, Ps. 143:8—10.) and in proportion as we willingly give up ourselves to be led in the paths of truth and holiness, we may know our adoption.—The apostle further observed, that he and his brethren at Rome had not received again "the spirit of bondage," to serve God from slavish fear; for this all must do, who continue under the law as a covenant, if they attempt to serve him at all. The Mosaic dispensation had a greater tendency to foster this temper, than the Christian religion has: and the Jews, too generally, considering the whole as a covenant of works, worshipped God in this slavish manner. But the greater number of the Roman converts had never been under the Mosaic law; yet they are spoken of indiscriminately, as having been formerly influenced by "the spirit of bondage:" we may therefore suppose, that those convictions were also intended, under which awakened sinners, even if in consequence converted, act more from fear and selfish principles, than established believers do; abstaining from many sins through dread of consequences, without decidedly hating them; and practising duties without loving them. These convictions indeed proceed from the moving of the Spirit of God upon their minds, and prepare them for receiving Christ by faith: but they are very different from the disposition, and state of mind and heart, of those who are brought into the full light and liberty of the gospel, and have received "the Spirit of adoption." (Marg. Ref. t, u.—Notes, Num. 17:12,13. Matt. 25:24—30. John 16:8—11,14,15. Gal. 4:4—7,21—31. Eph. 1:13,14. 2 Tim. 1:6—8. 1 John 4:18.) Then they are taught and animated to "serve God" with filial reverence, confidence, love, gratitude, submission, zeal, and admiring, adoring complacency; and are especially encouraged and emboldened to call upon him as "a Father," for all things which they want, and for support and deliverance under all their trials, notwithstanding their conscious unworthiness. The word "Abba," is Syriac for "Father:" and the use of different languages, in this connexion, sweetly indicates the harmony of Jews and Gentiles, and of different nations, in this filial worship of God according to the gospel. (Marg. Ref. x.—Notes, Matt. 6:6,9. Mark 14:36. Gal. 4:4—7.) Thus the Holy Spirit, by producing in believers the affections which dutiful children bear to a wise and good father, in their habitual state of heart toward God, most manifestly attests their adoption into his family. This is not done by a voice, or immediate revelation, or impulse, or merely by a text brought to the mind; (for all these things are equivocal and delusory;) but by "bearing witness with their spirits," or coinciding with the testimony of their own enlightened minds and consciences, as to their uprightness in embracing the gospel, and giving themselves up to the service of God. (Note, 2 Cor. 1:12—14, v. 12.) So that, while they are examining themselves concerning the reality of their conversion, and find scriptural evidence of it; the Holy Spirit, from time to time, shines on his own work, excites their holy affections into lively exercise, renders them very efficacious upon their conduct, and thus puts the matter beyond doubt; for while they feel the spirit of dutiful children towards God, as described in his holy word, they become satisfied concerning his paternal love to them. (Note, 9:1—3.) So that, this "witness of the Spirit" is borne along with that of our own consciences, not without it, nor against it: and it coincides with the testimony of the Holy Spirit, in the scripture, and must be proved and assayed by it. (Marg. Ref.

y, z.) But this being clearly ascertained, we may confidently regard ourselves as the heirs of the heavenly inheritance, (for "if children, then heirs,") and of God himself as our Portion; even "joint heirs with Christ," the beloved Son of the Father, being accepted in him, and appointed with him to share the glorious inheritance: (Notes, John 14:15—17. 2 Cor. 1:21,22. Eph. 1:3—8,13,14. 1 Pet. 1:3—5.) and of this we may be still more fully assured, if we patiently endure sufferings after his example, and for his sake, and the hope of being also "glorified with him." (Notes, Luke 22:28—30. 2 Tim. 2:8—13. 1 Pet. 4:12—16. 5:1—4. Rev. 1:9—11. 3:20—22.)

18 For <sup>d</sup> I reckon, that the sufferings of this present time, are not worthy to be compared with <sup>e</sup> the glory which shall be revealed in us.

20 For <sup>i</sup> the creature was made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of him who hath subjected the same, in hope;

23 And not only they, but ourselves also, <sup>n</sup> which have the first-fruits of the Spirit, <sup>o</sup> even we ourselves groan within ourselves, <sup>p</sup> waiting for the adoption, to wit, <sup>q</sup> the redemption of our body.

Note.—The apostle experienced an abundant measure of the sufferings of Christ: (Notes, Col. 1:24. 2 Tim. 2:8—13.) but, upon the most exact and deliberate computation of them, he found them "not worthy to be compared" with that glorious recompense, which will be bestowed on Christians, or "that glory which will be revealed" to them, and accomplished in them. So that it would be the greatest folly imaginable, for him to shrink from the pursuit of this promised felicity, through the dread of the most terrible of these transient sufferings. (Marg. Ref. d, e.—Notes, 5:3—5. 2 Cor. 4:8—18. 6:3—10.)—Indeed the whole visible creation seems to “wait,” with earnest expectation, for that important period, when the “children of God shall be manifested,” in the glory which is prepared for them: and in this, it resembles a man, who, with outstretched neck, looks, and waits with impatient longing, for the arrival of some beloved and expected friend. (Marg. Ref. f—h.) For “the creation itself was made subject to vanity” and disorder, through man’s apostasy: “not willingly,” but by a kind of constraint, through the guilt and righteous condemnation of Adam and his posterity. By this awful dispensation, the Lord subjected the creatures of this lower world, and even the visible creation, to vanity. Every thing seems perverted from its intended use: the inanimate creatures are pressed into the service of man’s rebellion; the luminaries of heaven give him light, by which to work wickedness; the fruits of the earth are sacrificed to his luxury, intemperance, and ostentation; its bowels are ransacked for metals, from which arms are forged for public and private murder and revenge; or to gratify man’s avarice, and excite him to fraud, oppression, and war. The animal tribes are subject to pain and death through man’s sin: and their sufferings are exceedingly increased by his cruelty, who, instead of a kind master, is become their inhuman butcher and tyrant. Above all, nearly every part of the creation has been and is perverted, in one way or other, to idolatry, which is especially “vanity.” (Note, 1:21—23.) The heavenly luminaries, the earth, rivers, woods, and mountains, as well as animals, have been adored as gods; while metals, stone, and wood, have been fashioned into idols, and decorations of idols; and all the prime of the productions of the earth have been offered in sacrifice unto them. So that, every thing is in an unnatural state: the good creatures of God appear evil, through man’s abuse of them; and even the enjoyment originally to be found in them, is turned into vexation, bitterness, and disappointment, by man’s idolatrous love of them and expectation from them. Yet this otherwise most deplorable state of the creation, is “in hope:” God intends to rescue it from this confused state, and to deliver it from being thus “held in bondage” to man’s depravity; that it may partake of “the glorious liberty of his children,” and minister to it. Thus we are assured, that “the whole creation groans” in every part, as with one sympathizing expression of anguish, (like a woman in the pains of travail, not as one in the agonies of death,) expecting and impatiently longing for a glorious event of all these distractions. This it has done ever since the fall, and will do, in a measure, till the end of the world. The miseries also of the human species, through their own and each other’s wickedness, as well as the state of the inferior creatures, declare the world to be in such a situation, as is not intended always to continue. (Marg. Ref. i—l.) Nay, not only do all creatures, and all other men here below, as it were, groan under the burdens imposed on them through sin: but even the “the children of God,” who have “the Spirit of adoption,” and his holy consolations, as the first fruits and pledge of their everlasting felicity, (Note, 14—17.) yet groan within themselves, through manifold pains, conflicts, temptations, and difficulties: and especially through the disquietude of indwelling sin; (Notes, 7:22—25. 2 Cor. 5:1—8.) and in “waiting for the adoption,” their public admission into the family of God, and to the enjoyment of their inheritance: at that season, when their bodies also shall be redeemed from the grave, incorruptible, immortal, and glorious. (Marg. Ref. m—p.—Note, 1 Cor. 15:50—54.) Then Satan, sin, death, misery, and all wicked creatures, will be confined to hell; and the rest of God’s creation will appear glorious, pure, beautiful, orderly, and happy; in every respect answering the end for which it was formed, and in nothing abused to contrary purposes. (Notes, Rev. 20:11—15. 21:1—4.)—The sufferings of animals, though very many and grievous, yet being unfeared and transient, are doubtless overbalanced by their enjoyments; and to infer an individual resurrection of all or any of them, from this passage, is surely one of the wildest reveries, which ever entered into the mind of a thinking man.—The happy effects produced by the gospel, when extensively successful, even in this present world, may be considered as earnest of the glorious scene, of which the apostle speaks: (Note, Rev. 20:4—6.) but “the manifestation of the sons of God” (19), and “the adoption, to wit, the redemption of the body” (23), clearly show that the general resurrection, and the state which follows, were especially, and indeed exclusively meant; for then only will “the children of God be manifested” as such, and be separated from all others. 24 For we are <sup>a</sup> saved by hope: <sup>r</sup> but hope that is seen is not hope; for what a man seeth, why doth he yet hope for?

25 But if we hope for that we see not, then do we <sup>s</sup> with patience wait for it.

26 Likewise the Spirit also helpeth our <sup>t</sup> infirmities: <sup>u</sup> for we know not what we should pray for as we ought; <sup>x</sup> but the Spirit itself maketh intercession for us, <sup>y</sup> with groanings which cannot be uttered.

27 And <sup>z</sup> he that searcheth the hearts, <sup>a</sup> knoweth what is the mind of the Spirit, <sup>* because</sup> <sup>b</sup> he maketh intercession for the saints <sup>c</sup> according to the will of God.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—True believers are saved “by,” or in, “hope;” they have been actually brought into a state of safety; but their comfort consists “in hope,” rather than fruition. Now that which is the object of sight, sense, or enjoyment, cannot properly be called “hope;” for how can a man be said to hope for the vision or fruition of that which he at present beholds and enjoys? The future felicity of the saints will chiefly consist in beholding the manifested glory of God; some glimpses by faith they here “see as in a glass darkly;” for the full vision and fruition of his glory they hope, and wait, in reliance on his promise, and “by patient continuance in well doing,” amidst manifold trials and temptations: and from this hope they cannot be diverted, by the vain expectation of finding satisfaction in the things of time and sense. (Marg. Ref. q—s.—Notes, 5:3—5. 1 Pet. 1:3—5.) For, though their infirmities are many and great, and they would soon be overpowered if left to themselves; yet the Spirit of God so helps them, and supports them, and so powerfully aids their exertions, feeble and infirm in themselves, that they are not entirely overcome. Indeed, as their strength and comfort, amid conflicts, must be obtained by prayer, and as they are so ignorant, forgetful, or unbelieving, that they know not what to ask for, or how to ask for any thing in a proper manner, and with proper affections; the same Spirit compassionately assists their memories, excites their desires and hopes, and increases their faith. Thus he becomes an inward “Intercessor,” by teaching them to offer such prayers, as are pleasing to God, and meet to be accepted through their heavenly Advocate. (Marg. Ref. t, u.—Notes, Ps. 37:4. Jam. 5:16—18. 1 John 5:14, 15. Jude 20, 21.) These prayers do not so much consist in copious and fluent expressions, which are often destitute of suitable affections; but in deep acquaintance with their own wants and miseries, earnest longings after spiritual blessings, and believing expectations of them, which are sometimes productive rather “of groans” than of words: or they are uttered in broken sentences and detached and earnest ejaculations, rather than a continued prayer; or they are larger than any words, however suitable, can express; as implying more than a man can find words to utter.—Perhaps the humble, broken-hearted supplicant, when thus groaning out his desires after pardon and deliverance from sin, is ashamed to offer such incoherent requests: but the heart-searching God well understands and approves this energetic language; which expresses “the mind of the Spirit,” when making intercession for the saints, in whom he dwells; according to the will of God, both in his promise, commandment, and providence, and such prayers will surely be answered, when the well-worded addresses of formalists will be rejected. (Marg. Ref. x, y.)—Mind of, &c.] ‘The phrase is ‘here ... the very same that was used in the ‘sixth verse; and expresses, not merely the ‘meaning, but the temper and disposition, of ‘the mind, as under the influences of the divine ‘Spirit, pursuing and breathing after such blessings, as suit its rational and immortal nature.’ Doddridge. to them who are <sup>f</sup> the called according to his purpose.

29 For <sup>g</sup> whom he did foreknow, <sup>h</sup> he also did predestinate <sup>i</sup> to be conformed to the image of his Son, <sup>k</sup> that he might be the first-born among many brethren.

30 Moreover <sup>l</sup> whom he did predestinate, them he also called; <sup>m</sup> and whom he called, them he also justified; <sup>n</sup> and whom he justified, them he also glorified.

31 What <sup>o</sup> shall we then say to these things? <sup>p</sup> If God be for us, who can be against us?

Note.—From the preceding considerations, the apostle assuredly concluded, that all events, in life or death, concurred in promoting the eternal good of every true believer, however bitter and painful they might at present be: for nothing could ever defeat the great end, proposed in all the dispensations of God respecting them, even their everlasting salvation.—Providential appointments are doubtless primarily intended: but as these often lead men into temptation, and so prove occasions of sin, we could have no assurance that they would “all work together for good,” if we were absolutely to except the effects of our own sin and folly. (Note, Gen. 22:1.) The sins, indeed, even of true believers, are not always over-ruled for their increase of present grace, or of future glory; in this respect they “suffer loss, and are saved as by fire:” (Note, 1 Cor. 3:10—15.) yet the whole concurs, as one complex plan, to prepare them for the inheritance intended for them; and many of their own mistakes and miscarriages, being deeply repented of, work together eminently for their humiliation, and the increase of their grateful love. (Marg. Ref. d, e.—Notes, 2 Chr. 32:24—33. Matt. 26:69—75. 2 Cor. 12:7—10. P. O. 1—10.) As far as they act in character, and live in the habitual exercise of “love to God,” all things concur in augmenting their final recompense. When they act out of character, corrections, and perhaps terrors, will be employed to bring them back again: and if a man allow himself in sin, expecting to derive good from it, he “does evil that good may come,” he “sins on that grace may abound,” he bears the broad mark of a hypocrite, and, “his damnation will be just.” So that we need not invalidate this animating assurance, to guard it from the perversion of wicked men, as some have done, to the great discouragement of humble Christians; who fear nothing so much by far even in their sharpest afflictions, as their own lamented propensity to sin. (Note, John 10:26—31.)—The persons intended once did not “love God;” (Notes, 5—9. 5:7—10.) but they had been “called” into a state of reconciliation and love to him, “according to his purpose” and choice of them, which he will never suffer to be frustrated. Having in his infinite, but incomprehensible wisdom and righteousness, permitted the fall and apostasy of man; he looked upon the whole human species as deserving of destruction, and meet for it: yet, purposing to provide and reveal a gracious salvation to them, for the glory of his name, he knew that they would as certainly reject this salvation, as they would break his holy law. For reasons therefore not revealed to us, he determined to leave some deservedly to perish in obstinate enmity; and graciously to recover others by regeneration and efficacious grace. These “he foreknew,” not merely in respect of external privileges, or as a part of favored nations, but as individually chosen to eternal life: for in consequence of this foreknowledge, “he predestinated,” or before decreed, them “to be conformed to the image of his son.” (Marg. Ref. f—h.—Note, Acts 2:22—24.) In this life they are in part renewed to his holy image, and walk in his steps; and, having passed, like Jesus, through many sufferings, they will hereafter be completely conformed to his holy human nature, both in body and soul: that so he may appear among them as “the first begotten,” and Head “of the many brethren,” which shall constitute the family of God; that, being admitted through him to be children and heirs, they may thus be made meet with him to enjoy their inheritance. (Note, 15—17.) As this was the “determined purpose and foreknowledge of God” respecting them; so all the intermediate steps were equally pre-determined. Thus the Lord “calls” to repentance, faith in Christ, and newness of life, every one whom he has “predestinated;” he “justifies,” through the righteousness of Christ, every one whom he “calls;” and he will finally “glorify” every one whom he “justifies.” (Marg. Ref. g—n.)—Sanctification is not expressly mentioned in this golden chain: but “predestination to be conformed to the image” of Christ, effectual calling, and final glory, so describe the beginning, the progress, and the consummation of sanctification, that no omission can in this respect be imputed to the apostle. In the language of faith and hope, he speaks of the whole work as already done, because ensured by the purposes and promises of God; and he demands what can be said unto, or against, such things. For if God be thus “for us,” freely and absolutely, our unchangeable Friend, and thus determined to bless us with everlasting felicity; who or what can be so against us, as to defeat his gracious purpose? Or what need have we to fear the rage and power of all creatures, if they should combine against us? (Marg. Ref. o, p.)—From this and similar passages, some persons have absurdly spoken of our having been justified from eternity, &c. but the fixed intention of doing any thing, is perfectly distinct from the actual performance of it. God as absolutely determined the final glorification of every believer, as he did the justification of every elect person: we might then as well say, they have been glorified in body and soul from all eternity: this could not be more absurd or unscriptural, than the notion of being justified from eternity; and probably it would be less capable of perversion. —Dr. Whistly says, that all the fathers, before Augustine, understood this passage ‘of those, whom God foresaw would love him.’ But does God foresee, that any of our race, while unregenerate, will love him? (Note, Eph. 1:3—8.) And is not the clause “called according to his purpose,” of the same import as regenerated? And can this choice of some, rather than others, of our fallen race, because of something spiritually good in them, as the ground of it, in order to their being thus “called,” possibly consist with the doctrines of original sin, or the total depravity of human nature, and of a regeneration from the death of sin to the life of righteousness? Does it not border on Pelagianism? This, however, gives up the notion of a national election being intended. Indeed, if all the Gentiles, or all the inhabitants of any one nation, whom God foreknew, and determined to call into his church, be actually “conformed to the image of Christ,” and “justified,” and shall, without exception, partake of eternal glory; the interpretation of the passage, as referring to the election of collective bodies, may stand; but otherwise it cannot. So that, if this were the only passage, in which the humiliating subject was expressly mentioned; we might confidently maintain, that the doctrine of individual predestination to eternal life, and the authority of the apostle as an inspired writer, must stand or fall together. Nothing more fully shows this, than the difficulties to which its very learned and sagacious opposers are reduced; and the different and discordant grounds on which they rest their cause; for they scarcely agree in any thing, but in determining to oppose the most natural and obvious meaning of the words. Perhaps the apostle’s doctrine was never more justly expressed by any uninspired writer, than in the former part of the seventeenth article of our church. “Predestination unto life, is the everlasting purpose of God, whereby (before the foundations of the world were laid,) he hath constantly decreed by his counsel, secret to us, to deliver from curse and damnation those whom he hath chosen in Christ out of mankind; and to bring them by Christ to everlasting salvation, as vessels made to honor. “Wherefore they which be endued with so excellent a benefit of God, be called according to God’s purpose, by his Spirit working in due season; they through grace obey the calling; they be justified freely; they be made the sons of God by adoption; they be made like the image of his only begotten Son Jesus Christ; they walk religiously in good works, and at length by God’s mercy, they attain to everlasting felicity.”—Love God, &c. (28) Notes, Jan. 1:12. 2:5—7. 1 John 4:9—12, 19.

34 Who <sup>y</sup> is he that condemneth? <sup>z</sup> It is Christ that died, yea, rather than he is risen again, <sup>a</sup> who is even at the right hand of God, <sup>b</sup> who also maketh intercession for us.

Note.—The omnipotence and omniscience of God had been, in the preceding verse, opposed to the puny efforts of every enemy: here, his former benefits are shown to be assured pledges of final felicity, to all real Christians. The holiness of God and man’s sinfulness seemed to bar the way to man’s happiness; but the free love of God to them, when rebels and enemies, induced him to “give his own Son” to be their Surety and Sacrifice, who willingly assumed their nature, in order to bear their sins: and in this, the Father “spared him not, but delivered him up” to agony, ignominy, and death; notwithstanding his personal dignity and excellency, the perfection of his obedience, and his own inconceivable love of him. (Marg. Ref. q, r.—Notes, 5:6—10. Is. 53:7—10. 2 Pet. 2:4—9.) Thus he bore the curse in the stead of all his people, and so expiated their guilt, even when they were enemies; and having, in virtue of that atonement, and his own eternal choice, called them into a state of peace with him, and taught them to love and obey him; how can it be supposed, that he will now withhold any thing from them? (Marg. Ref. s.—Notes, Ps. 84:11,12. 1 Cor. 3:18—23. Eph. 3:20,21.) All things in heaven and earth, the universal creation, yea, the everlasting enjoyment of the Creator himself as their Portion, are not so great a display of his free love to them, as the gift of his co-equal Son to be the atonement on the cross for their sins; and all the rest necessarily follows upon their union with him, and interest in him. (Note, John 3:16.) The emphasis is evidently here laid, not on Christ as incarnate, being given up to death for us; but in God’s giving his own Son to become incarnate for such a purpose. (Note, John 5:17,18.)—Who then “can lay any thing to the charge of God’s elect;” to the charge of those whose election is manifested, by their being called to (Note, Zech. 3:1—4.) If they look forward to the day of judgment; who shall then condemn them? 35 Who <sup>e</sup> shall separate us from the love of Christ? <sup>d</sup> shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword?

Note.—As infinite and unchangeable power and love, are engaged in behalf of all believers, and the mercy already shown them is greater than all that which is further needful; they may even triumph on the field of battle, and exult amidst their conflicts and groans: for “who shall separate them from the love of Christ,” who has chosen, redeemed, called, and justified them? Shall trials, persecutions, or calamities of any kind, degree, or continuance? Shall the sword of war, or that of the executioner? Indeed it had been written of old, that the harmless people of God were, and would be, butchered like sheep. (Marg. Ref. c—f.—Notes, 5: 6—10. Ps. 44:17—22. John 16:1—3. Eph. 3: 14—19, vv. 18, 19.) But, instead of being separated from his love by these events, they would be brought to the more complete enjoyment of it: and so not only escape unhurt, or barely come off victorious; but they would also be made “more than conquerors,” even immense gainers, by their sufferings, through the supporting grace of their loving Saviour. (Marg. Ref. g, h.—Notes, 2 Chr. 20:22—25. 32:27—29.) Indeed, the apostle was fully “persuaded,” or assured, that neither the love of life, nor its snares and trials, nor the fear, agony, or separating stroke of death in any form, nor the machinations of evil angels, or of all the principalities and powers of darkness, or the ungodly persecuting princes of this world; nor any present calamities, or future unknown changes or undiscovered scenes; neither the height of prosperity, nor the depth of adversity; neither the highest created power, nor the deepest plots of subtle enemies; nor any creature, nor all creatures, shall ever prevail to separate true believers “from the love of God in Christ Jesus” towards them: as his purposes are unchangeable, his engagements irrevocable, and his power invincible. (Marg. Ref. i—q.—Note, 1 Cor. 3:18—23.)—It is frivolous to say, that sin, being no creature of God, may separate the believer from his love, notwithstanding all this: for such a restriction wholly invalidates the passage. Tribulation, persecution, the terror of death, the frowns or smiles of the world, and the machinations of evil spirits, have not the smallest tendency to “separate us from the love of God,” except as they prove occasions of sin. Professed believers in such circumstances often forsake God and perish; but “all his saints are in his hand,” and “are kept by his power through faith unto salvation:” so that they either resist and overcome every temptation; or if baffled and foiled, they are brought back by convictions and corrections, with penitent tears and fervent supplications; and they dread suffering chiefly, because they fear lest it should prove the occasion of indwelling sin gaining some victory over them. (Notes, Luke 22:31—34. John 10:26—31. 1 Pet. 1:3—5.)—If a man take encouragement to sin from such assurances, he renders it extremely probable that he has no interest in them: no one can triumph on this ground, who has not scrip-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

The terrors of the law, and our own consciousness of guilt and indwelling sin, should endear to us the free salvation of the gospel; and urge us to flee for refuge to Christ, that we may be safe in him, as Noah was in the ark, when threatened destruction shall overwhelm all ungodly men.—While we earnestly desire to be delivered from condemnation, let us seek for grace to enable us “to walk, not after the flesh, but after the Spirit:” thus it will be evident, that “the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus, hath made us free from the law of sin and death,” and that the grace of the gospel has already done far more towards our sanctification, than the law could possibly ever do for those, who desired to be under it. For if we truly rely on the sacrifice of the Son of God, “in the likeness of sinful flesh,” for our sins; we shall find that our old nature is condemned and must be crucified; we shall heartily concur in putting this sentence in execution; and long for “the righteousness of the law to be fulfilled in us,” even as it was by our Surety. Of this, our present habitual “walk after the Spirit” is an earnest and sure pledge. But “the carnal mind” and conversation are evidences, that a man “is dead in sin” and under the curse of the law, however he may speak about the grace of the gospel: for those who are “alive to God,” and “at peace with him,” are spiritual in their judgment, affections, and habitual walk, though they grieve that they are not more so. But “the carnal mind is enmity against God:” no unregenerate man can delight in his holy law, or be subject to it; and how can it be expected that God should be pleased with the formal services of enemies and rebels? We should, therefore, especially examine ourselves, whether “the Spirit of Christ dwell in us.” for if this be not our case, we do not belong to him, are not in his kingdom, and shall not have our portion with him; but with the wicked, “in the everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels,” unless this entire change be wrought in our hearts, and lives, during our continuance in this world.

V. 10—17.

If “the Spirit of Christ” have taken possession of our hearts, and renewed his holy image there; the death of our “mortal bodies” will make way for perfecting the life of our immortal souls, in which eternal life now abides; and, through the Redeemer’s righteousness, our bodies too shall be raised again to share that glorious felicity. What then can a worldly life present to our view, worthy for a moment to be put in competition with this noble “prize of our high calling?” All that we owe to the flesh, is a holy revenge for the injuries already done, and the hindrances continually given us: and instead of rendering our state doubtful, by living after it in any degree; we should, by the Spirit, continually endeavor, more and more entirely, to mortify it, and repress all its actings. (Note, Gal. 5:16—18,22—26.) Thus, giving up ourselves to be “led by the Spirit,” our adoption will be manifest, we shall gradually be emancipated from servile motives and fears, and shall trust and obey God, and walk with him as our reconciled Father; the Holy Spirit will witness with our consciences, that we have the temper of loving, obedient children towards him; and thus support us in all trials and circumstances with the joyful prospect and most blessed anticipations of our incorruptible inheritance.

V. 18—27.

It is the will of our heavenly Father, that “in the world we should have tribulations,” and have fellowship with Christ in his sufferings, before we “be glorified together” with him. But on the most rational principles, and most exact computation, we shall find, “that the sufferings of this present time, are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us;” even if, instead of our light trials, we were called to bear as heavy and durable a cross as that of the apostle.—Indeed, sin has filled the world with suffering, yea, with unspeakable disorder and misery; all creatures seem to proclaim man’s fatal apostasy, and to recommend the inestimably precious salvation of Christ.—Men every where are most evidently at war with their Maker and with each other: so that the earth is become a great slaughterhouse and burying ground, to its inhabitants; and the animals are forced into the service of men’s lusts, by a most abominable perversion: and the creatures of God are made his rivals, in that men generally, every where and through every age, “have worshipped the creature more than the Creator, who is blessed for evermore.” Thus the “creation groans under bondage” to human depravity; every part of it seems to abet man’s rebellion, or to be an instrument of his crimes; and the more reflecting even of the heathen could see the strange state of the world, though they saw neither the cause nor the cure of it. But the gospel opens a brighter prospect; a glorious crisis approaches, of which all things seem in anxious expectation. When “the children of God shall be manifested,” and separated from his implacable foes, a complete deliverance from this bondage will be given to all, except Satan and his obstinate adherents; and sin, deformity, vanity, and misery, shall be seen no where, but in the bottomless pit. May we then give diligence to ensure our interest in this redemption, and to possess “the first-fruits of the Spirit, the earnest and pledge” of our inheritance. Then our groans under our share of this universal ruin, while we wait for our final adoption, will be "in hope:" we shall learn to disregard the perishing things which are seen, and patiently to expect and wait for the good things, which are unseen and eternal. The Spirit of God will help us under our infirmities to support our trials: and, notwithstanding our own insufficiency, we shall, by his effectual teaching and aid, pray to our heavenly Father, with such large and spiritual desires, and such unutterable pantings after his salvation, as shall ensure a gracious answer, and abundant supplies of every needful blessing.

If assured, that we really "love God," and that we habitually endeavor to keep his commandments; we may rest satisfied, that all things shall finally terminate to our greatest advantage. For the love of God, ruling in the hearts of those who were once enmity to him, proves that they have been "called according to his purpose," in order to be "conformed to the image of his Son," and made meet as his brethren to be "joint heirs with him." But none can have any ground to think themselves predestinated, called, or justified, or to expect to be glorified; except they love God, bear the image of Christ, walk in his steps, and aim to obey and honor him: and, whatever men may object against these things, they who are thus chosen, called, and justified, shall without doubt be eternally glorified; nor will a single exception be found to this rule, though many will at length appear to have deceived themselves and others. If God has determined to save us, who can destroy us? If "he spared not his own Son, but delivered him" to death for us; how should he refuse any thing to us? If this was not too large a gift for his enemies, what can he withhold from his friends and children? If he justifies us, who can condemn us? If our crucified and risen Jesus pleads and fights for us, who can plead or fight against us, with any possibility of prevailing? If the Judge himself is our Friend, who can pronounce a sentence against us? Or "what can separate us from the love of him" who bled on the cross for us, when we were so guilty and depraved, that hell was our desert, and the doom for which we were meet? While therefore we rejoice in these privileges and this security, and cheerfully expect to be "more than conquerors" in every conflict, and immense gainers by every loss and tribulation, till "death be swallowed up in victory;" let us show the holiness of the doctrine by sparing none of our lusts, shrinking from no hardship or expense, in the cause of Christ, willingly enduring our cross, obeying his commandments, and being "steadfast, unmoveable, and always abounding in his work, as knowing that our labor is not in vain in the Lord." (Note, 1 Cor. 15:55—58.)

CHAP. IX.

The apostle deeply laments the unbelief of his countrymen, and declares his willingness to endure any thing for their salvation. 1—3. He shows the privileges of Israel as a nation, 4, 5; and the difference between Israelites according to the flesh, and the true Israel, 6—8. He illustrates his subject, by the examples of Isaac, of Jacob and Esau, and of Pharaoh; and thus shows the freeness of the mercy of God, and his holy but absolute sovereignty in all his dispensations, 9—19. He answers objections to his doctrine, 19—23; proves it from the prophets, 24—28; and evinces, that the Jews come short of the blessing, (which the Gentiles obtained by faith,) because "they sought it by the works of the law," and rejected Christ, 30—33.

I SAY the truth in Christ, I lie not, <sup>b</sup> my conscience also bearing me witness in the Holy Ghost,

2 That <sup>c</sup> I have great heaviness and continual sorrow in my heart.

3 For <sup>d</sup> I could wish that myself <sup>e</sup> were * accursed from Christ for <sup>f</sup> my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh;

Note.—From the apostle's arguing so strenuously for "salvation by grace," "through faith" alone, without any respect to the Mosaic law, or the peculiar privileges of the Jews; it might perhaps be inferred, that he had no great attachment to his countrymen; nay, that the persecutions, which he had endured from them, had alienated him from them. Being, therefore, about still more fully to discuss the subject, of the rejection of the Jews and the calling of the Gentiles, and to resolve the whole into the sovereign electing love of God; he introduced these topics, by expressing, in the most energetic language, his cordial affection for his people. He spoke the truth, as in the presence of Christ his Judge, and with a solemn appeal to him, that he did in no degree deviate from it: his conscience also, being enlightened and directed by "the Holy Spirit, bare witness" to his sincerity, in what he was about to say. (Marg. Ref. a, b.) The appeal is evidently equivalent to a solemn oath. Now, an oath being an act of religious worship; the apostle by thus solemnly appealing to Jesus Christ, and to the Holy Spirit, fully shows, that he considered them as entitled to religious worship, as one with the Father. (Note, Matt. 28:19, 20.) Having made this solemn protestation, he declared that the unbelief and rejection of the Jews excited exceedingly great disquietude, and depression, and constant grief, in his heart. (Note, 8:14—17.) Inasmuch, that he would even willingly submit to be treated as an Anathema, or "accursed," after the manner of Christ; to be excommunicated from his visible church, loaded with infamy, crucified, or in any way put to the utmost pain and disgrace; or even for a time to be excluded from all the comfort of communion with Christ, and shut up under the deepest horror and distress of mind which could be endured without sin; if, by any personal sufferings of his own, that could consist with his final salvation, he might rescue his beloved brethren and kinsmen, from that national and personal destruction, which he saw was about to come upon them for their obstinate unbelief. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. c—f.—Note, Ex. 32:30—33.)—This seems to be the utmost that the apostle could mean; as it would be utterly unlawful, on any consideration whatever, to wish to be eternally miserable, and an implacable enemy of God, as all who perish will be. (Note, 1 John 3:16, 17.)—"I could even wish," ('if it were proper to 'make such a wish, if it would avail to make so

On some occasion, perhaps, the apostle had passionately wished, or prayed, to this effect. This appears to me the most literal and natural construction of the clause: but, as I can bring no support to the interpretation, from more competent critics, I propose it with great hesitation.—Eυχομαι is not used in any other sense in the New Testament; though it is in the Greek writers.—Accursed.] Αραθημα. 5 Whose <sup>o</sup> are the fathers, <sup>p</sup> and of whom as concerning the flesh Christ came, <sup>q</sup> who is over all, God <sup>r</sup> blessed for ever. <sup>s</sup> Amen. [Practical Observations.]

Note.—The apostle was peculiarly grieved, by reflecting, that all the distinguished favors, shown to his people, should terminate in the rejection of them for opposing Christ. They were the descendants of Israel, "who wrestled with God and prevailed:" they had long been the professed worshippers of JEHOVAH, to whom the typical adoption pertained. The covenants made with Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Aaron, and David; the law given at mount Sinai; and the national covenant grounded on it, belonged to them, and were so many peculiar honors and advantages, towards their becoming the spir-itual people of God. (Marg. Ref. g, h.—Note, 3:1,2.) The worship at the temple, which was both typical of salvation by the Messiah, and the means of grace and communion with God; and the ark of the covenant, the symbol and pledge of the Lord's gracious presence with them, had for ages been their glory. All the promises, concerning Christ and his salvation, were immediately given and preserved to them;

they were honorable, by their descent from the ancient patriarchs, who walked with God and were accepted by him; and finally, the Messiah had in the time predicted been born among them, one of their nation "as concerning the flesh;" even He, who is "God over all" creatures, blessed and praised throughout all worlds, and to all eternity: to this the apostle fixed his cordial Amen. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. i—s.)—The expression "concerning the flesh," implies that Christ had a far higher and nobler nature: even as when Paul used it concerning the Jews his brethren, he intimated his sorrow that they were not his brethren, as the children of God, born of the Spirit, and believers in Christ. This, with various other considerations, undeniably proves, that the apostle here meant, in the most decided manner, to attest the Deity of Christ, as One with the Father, and equally the Object of universal and everlasting adoration. (Note, 1 John 4:1—3.)—There is no example, either in the New Testament, or in the Greek translation of the Old Testament, in which the doxology, "Blessed be God," is expressed in the same words, and arranged in the same manner, as in this place. So that the only way, in which the Socinians and Arians have attempted to evade the con-clusion, unavoidably deducible from this text, namely by rendering the clause, "Who is over all; God be blessed for evermore;" rests on a most harsh, unnatural, and unclassical construction, of which no example can be adduced; at the same time that it destroys the antithesis, without which the verse would be wholly destitute of propriety and animation.

accomplishment. (Marg. Ref. t.—Notes, 3:3,4, 11:1—6.) Their national covenant had been fulfilled to them, till it was finally forfeited; the promises respecting the Messiah had been performed; and the spiritual covenant and promises did not belong to them, as a nation, but only to such of them as believed, in common with other believers: (Notes, 15:8—13.) for all were not the true Israel of God, who were naturally descended from Jacob. (Marg. Ref. u.—Notes, 2:27—29, 4:9—12, Ps. 73:1, John 1:47—51.) Indeed this had been intimated in the case of Abraham and his seed: for the covenant made with him, in favor of his children, did not include all his posterity; but it was limited to the line of Isaac, when the Lord said to him, "In Isaac shall thy seed be called." (Marg. Ref. x, y.—Notes, Gen. 17:17—21, 21:8—12.) So that all his children, in the ordinary course of things, were not adopted, as the children of God, even in a typical sense; but those only, who sprang from him according to the promise, and by the extraordinary power of God performing it, when Sarah was naturally past child-bearing. (Marg. Ref. z—b.—Notes, Gen. 17:5,6,19—21, 18:9—15, 21:1—7.)—The apostle evidently speaks of a true Israel, among the descendants of Israel; a remnant, as distinguished from the nation at large: and he introduces the case of Abraham and his two sons, and afterwards that of Esau and Jacob, not as examples, but as illustrations of his main subject. (Notes, Gal. 4:21—31, 6:15,16.) If this were carefully noted, the perplexity which involves the reasonings of many learned men on this passage, would in a great measure vanish. "The children of the promise," are those "whom God gives to Abraham, by a spiritual generation, whether alone, as in the case of us Gentiles; or added to the carnal generation, as in the case of Isaac, and of all believing Jews. ... They who interpret "the children of promise," to mean those, who by faith embrace the promise; say indeed what is fact, but do not speak with suitable precision: for the apostle does not in this place distinguish the children of Abraham from others, by their faith as known; but he discourses concerning the primary cause, that is, the fountain of their faith itself, namely the eternal purpose of gratuitous election." Beza.—Isaac was promised some time before his birth; and the faithfulness and power of God having fulfilled that promise, he was "the child of promise," in whom Abraham's "seed should be called," and in whose "Seed the nations should be blessed;" but Ishmael was not thus previously promised; and it was foretold that the chosen nation, which was to inherit Canaan, and from whom the Messiah was appointed to spring, would not descend from him, but from Isaac. In like manner, all the descendants of Israel were not entitled to the spiritual blessings of the covenant; but only "the remnant according to the election of grace," which was found among them: and these, being regenerated and having believed in Christ, were brought into the family of believing Abraham, as the children of promise, in whom the promises to him, concerning his numerous posterity and their extraordinary privileges, should be especially fulfilled. (Notes, 4:9—17, 11:1—6, Matt. 3:7—10, Gal. 3:26—29, Heb. 6:13—15.)—In thus adducing the case of Isaac and Ishmael, the apostle certainly did not decide on the eternal state of either of these individuals: yet the subject which he thus illustrated, namely, a remnant of believers among an unbelieving nation, must refer, not to outward advantages and disadvantages, but to eternal salvation or damnation; for "he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned." And this is equally clear, whether it be held, that this remnant believed, in consequence of their being elected; or that they were chosen, in consequence of their faith, either as foreseen, or as actually exercised.—In Isaac, &c. (7) From the LXX, who accord with the Hebrew. Yet not only Ishmael, Abraham's son by Hagar, the bond-woman, and his children by Keturah, were excluded; but even Esau and his posterity, though the elder son of Isaac and Rebekah, and twin-brother to Jacob, was set aside; and this not subsequent to any crime by which he forfeited the birthright, but previously. For even before the children were born, and consequently "before they had done any good or evil," it was said to Rebekah that "the elder should serve the younger;" (Note, Gen. 25:22,23.) which certainly implied the special favor of God to Jacob above Esau, and that the covenanted blessings respecting Canaan, the oracles and ordinances of God, and the promised Messiah, would be restricted to him and his descendants. This clearly indicated, that "the purpose of God," in respect of "the heirs of promise," would be established according to his sovereign election, who calls men to partake of the blessing as he pleases; and not in the foresight of any works which they would perform. Doubtless, God foresaw that Esau's works would be profane and evil; (Notes, Gen. 25:31—34, 27:41,42, Heb. 12:15—17.) and Jacob's in a measure pious and holy; but the good works of Jacob could only be foreseen, as the effect of his election and consequent regeneration; and thus foreseen as the effect, they could not be the cause of these blessings. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. c—k.—Note, Eph. 1:3—8.) God foresaw both Esau and Jacob as "born in sin, and by nature the children of wrath, even as others;" (Note, Eph. 2:3.) and he knew that, if left to themselves, they would continue in sin through life: but (for wise and holy reasons known to himself but not revealed to us,) he purposed to change Jacob's heart, and to leave Esau to his native perverseness; because he freely loved Jacob, but did not in the same manner love Esau. Wickedness foreseen is doubtless the cause of the Lord's purpose to condemn; because it is of a man's self by nature, and God condemns none, who do not justly deserve it: but holiness foreseen in a fallen creature, cannot be the cause of his election; because it is the effect of new creating grace, and never comes from any other source. Thus preterition, or non-election, of a fallen creature, is not gratuitous, but merited: election, shown in regeneration, is gratuitous. This instance of Esau and Jacob was intended as an illustration of the divine conduct towards the fallen race of man.—It has often been urged, that Jacob and Esau were not so much personally intended, as their posterity; and that temporal, and not eternal, things are spoken of; and this is certainly true. Jacob never had dominion over Esau personally, but his posterity ruled over Esau's. (Notes, Gen. 25:22,23, 27:27—29,39, 40, Mal. 1:2—5.)—The election, the predication, the birth-right, and the blessing, secured to Jacob and his seed the same religious advantages, which the promise of God secured to Isaac and his seed; and excluded Esau, as well as Ishmael, from them: and this, without determining any thing of Esau's eternal state; through his character, and the epithet profane annexed to his name by the apostle, seem to indicate, that he was not a believer. It is however evident, that the subject illustrated related to individuals and to their eternal state, whether as believers or unbelievers. As Esau, that "the purpose of God according to election might stand," had no inheritance in Canaan, and was not the progenitor of Christ; so those Israelites, who did not belong to "the election of grace," were excluded from the true church, had no part in Christ, and no inheritance in heaven. But the reverse was true of "the election of grace:" those who belonged to this election were "called," and in consequence believed; they were "justified" in Christ and "glorified:" (Note, 8:28—31.) and the same is the case in respect of men, in all other ages and nations. If indeed, there were any of our race, not fallen like other men, or not "by nature dead in sin, and children of wrath, even as others;" if there were any inclined, without preventing grace, to repent, and to believe the humbling, holy gospel of Christ, to love God and obey his will; then indeed the election might be made, with respect to their foreseen faith and obedience. But on this supposition, what ground would there be for the objections, which the apostle evidently supposes would be made to his doctrine? or what reason to silence them, in the manner he afterwards does; when he might easily, and consistently with truth, have given an answer far more satisfactory to the objectors, by clearly explaining his meaning? It is then inquired, First, Are all men, as born of Adam, equally depraved? and secondly, Is man willing of himself to do what is spiritually good; or does the grace of God make him willing? When these questions are answered, according to the scriptures, and the articles and liturgy of our church, it will readily be perceived, that no good, foreseen, either in the hearts or lives of sinners, could be the cause of their election to eternal life.—If then God loved Jacob, and hated Esau, (or showed him less favor than Jacob,) without any reference to their works, as comparatively good or bad, then the grand principle is established, that God does show more favor to one man, than to another, independently of their righteousness or unrighteousness. And, "is there unrighteousness with God?" could any injustice be objected to him? By no means: he did Esau no wrong in leaving him to his own choice; and he, and his posterity, received more favors than they deserved: nor did the unmerited love of God, to Jacob and his posterity, in any measure injure Esau.—Even in respect of holy creatures, we must either allow, that God may justly permit them to sin, and punish them for it, and so at least foreknow, both the permission and the punishment; or else we must deny that he can act as a moral Governor of the universe. For, if this were not just, God would be bound to prevent all his creatures from sinning: and if any were left to sin, He only would be the cause of it. Indeed, men are not aware what blasphemy is involved, in their bold objections on this subject.—Much more then may God righteously leave fallen creatures to themselves, to proceed in rebellion, and sink into destruction. He might justly have thus left all: it is of infinite mercy that any are saved; their salvation can be no injury to those, who are punished only according to the desert of their own sins: and it is evident, that most of the objections, brought against these doctrines, originate from the want of a deep conviction, that God would have been just, had he left our whole fallen race under final condemnation: as the supposition that he leaves a large proportion of them thus to perish, excites in numbers the same opposition, and leads them to the same exclamations and objections, as the doctrine of personal election. Indeed, the sentence to be denounced at the last day, on the unnumbered millions of the wicked, is as dreadful, as any thing in this doctrine can be, (Notes, 3:5—8, Matt. 25:41—46.)—The election of nations, to special privileges and religious advantages, not vouchsafed to other nations, which some expositors suppose to be here meant, (contrary to the whole tenor of the context,) is liable to all the same objections, as personal election; and can only be vindicated in the same way. All nations might justly be left without them: and when some are mercifully favored with them, "that the purpose of God according to election might stand, not of works but of him that calleth;" no wrong is done to the others.—The elder, &c. (12) From the LXX, which accord with the Hebrew. 15 For he saith to Moses, <sup>p</sup>I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I will have compassion.

16 So then <sup>q</sup>it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that showeth mercy.

17 For <sup>r</sup>the scripture saith unto Pharaoh, <sup>s</sup>Even for this same purpose have <sup>t</sup>I raised thee up, <sup>u</sup>that I might show my power in thee, and that <sup>x</sup>my name might be declared throughout all the earth.

18 Therefore <sup>y</sup>hath he mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will <sup>z</sup>he hardeneth.

Note.—Mercy presupposes misery and sin, 'or the voluntary corruption of the human race: and this corruption presupposes a creation in 'purity and uprightness.' Beza.—Moses himself had written as strong language concerning the sovereignty of God in showing mercy, as the apostle used, when ΓΕΝΟΥΑΗ declared, "I will have mercy on whom I have mercy; and I will have compassion on whom I have compassion;" for the latter clause is in the present tense; which implies, that he would by no influence be induced to alter his fixed purpose of showing mercy, or executing vengeance. (Marg. Ref. p.—Note, Ex. 33:18,19.) In the case of Jacob, it indeed appeared, that he was willing to obtain the blessing, and he ran at his mother's word: thus he prevented Esau; and Isaac, contrary to his purpose, blessed him: but the whole transaction was disgraceful, and merited the indignation rather than the favor of God. (Marg. Ref. q.—Notes, Gen. 27:1—29.) The establishment, however, of the covenant with Jacob, and his posterity, did not originate from this "willing or running," but from the electing love of God; whose purpose respecting him had been made known many years before.—Thus believers greatly desire the salvation of Christ, and labor to secure it, yet these desires are streams from the fountain of electing love. They "were by nature children of wrath, even as others: but God, who is rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith he loved them, even when they were dead in sins, hath quickened them together with Christ." (Notes, John 15:12—16. Eph. 2:3—10. Tit. 3:4—7.) Thus he makes them willing by regeneration; and they are inclined and excited to the diligent use of means, and through these they are made partakers of salvation; the singfulness, attending their very diligence, being graciously forgiven. (Note, Phil. 2:12,13.) Whereas they, who are not thus willing and diligent, are not made unwilling by any positive act of God; but their unwillingness is the consequence of their own pride, self-will, love of sin, and aversion to God and holiness. It springs from innate depravity, and is increased and strengthened by habits of disobedience; and can never be removed, except by an act of almighty power, which God cannot be bound in justice to perform for any of his rebellious creatures. Men are indeed naturally willing to be saved from misery, and made happy; and are often very diligent in proud and unbelieving endeavors to obtain their object: (Note, 10:1—4.) but this is widely different from a cordial willingness, to be saved from sin as well as misery, and made holy and happy, in the humbling method of the gospel: diligently to use all the means, freely to submit to all the privations, and patiently to endure all the self-denial, requisite in order to obtain it.—This subject might be further illustrated by the case of Pharaoh. God, the Creator, advanced him in his providence to great authority and prosperity, and spared his life through the several plagues of Egypt: but, at the same time, he left him to harden himself in enmity and rebellion. Now God had declared, that he intended this on purpose that in his destruction he might make known his own power and glory throughout the earth. (Marg. Ref. s—x.—Notes, Ex. 4:21. 7:13. 8:15. 9:13—16.) So that it must be allowed, that God has mercy on such of our apostate race, as he sees good; and that "he hardeneth whom he will," by leaving them to themselves, and under the power of Satan; by ordering his dispensations respecting them in such a manner, as he knows will exasperate their enmity and embolden their presumption; and by judicially sentencing them to final obduracy, that his justice in their punishment may become the more conspicuous. (Note, 2 Thes. 2:8—12.)—As Pharaoh perished in desperate rebellion against God, who can deny, that his ruin was eternal, as well as temporal; personal, not national?—"This hardening also 'is voluntary, because the Lord, offended by 'their depravity, makes use of their own will, 'in executing this judgment on those whom he 'hardens. Then follow the fruits of this hardening, namely, unbelief and sins, which are the 'real causes of the condemnation of the reprobate.' Beza.—I will have mercy, &c. (15) From the Sept. 21 Hath not the potter power over the clay, of the same lump to make one vessel unto honor, and another unto dishonor?

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The unhumbled opposer would be sure here to object and cavil, and to inquire, 'why the Lord blamed or punished Pharaoh, or indeed any man, for his sins. Who had resisted his sovereign will and appointment? Even they, who most rebel against his precepts, fulfil his decrees: his will is therefore universally done, and no creature makes any opposition to it!'—As if the secret purpose of God were, or possibly could be, a rule of duty to his creatures! Or as if a man could intend to do the will of God, by breaking his express commandments, out of enmity to him, and to gratify his own lusts! (Marg. Ref. a, b.) To this presumptuous objector (and such objectors are very numerous, when both the avowed enemies, and the false friends, of these doctrines are included,) the apostle answered, by demanding of him, (a man, a sinner,) "who he was," that he should count himself authorized to "reply against God," and to charge him with injustice, or want of wisdom, for those things which he had expressly spoken and done. (Notes, Job 33:12,13. 34:10—30. 42:1—6.) Was it proper for the creature to call his Creator to an account, for having formed him as he saw good? Would not men allow the infinite God the same sovereign right to manage the affairs of the creation, as the potter exercises in disposing of his clay, when of the same lump he makes one vessel to a more honorable, and another to a meaner use? (Marg. and Marg. Ref. d—g.—Notes, 22,23. Is. 45:9,10. 64:6—8. Jer. 18:1—10. 2 Tim. 2:20—22.) Would they give the "only wise God" no credit for his justice, wisdom, truth, and goodness, when they could not fully comprehend them? Would they not infer, from his infinite perfection, that he could not do wrong, however it might appear to them? And could there be any danger from the exercise of absolute sovereignty by infinite wisdom and excellency? would they dare to dictate to the Lord, to determine what he ought to do, or to call him to an account for what he had done? (Note, 11:33—36.)—The apostle could not mean, as it is plain from the whole context, that God might justly make innocent creatures miserable by prerogative, which some seem at least to suppose: for he goes upon the supposition, that the sovereignty of God is that of infinite wisdom, justice, truth, and goodness: and that he always decrees to do, what is the most proper to be done. The words, "I will have mercy, on whom I will have mercy," imply that all deserved wrath; so that "the lump of clay, in the hands of the potter," must refer to men already existing in God's foreknowledge as fallen creatures. But the apostle intended to repress the arrogance of ignorant presumptuous worms, who venture to speak about injustice, cruelty, and tyranny, in discoursing of their offended Creator and Judge; who decide, by vain reasoning in their own minds, how the infinite God ought to act; and then forgetting who He is, and who they are, charge him foolishly, and say, that if such and such doctrines be indeed true, then God is—but their words ought not to be repeated. This very common practice is such a compound of arrogance, irreverence, and folly, that it seems the most glaring proof of human depravity, which even this wicked world exhibits; especially when it is added, that pious men sometimes appear, in the violence of controversy, to be betrayed into it.—It is wonderful that the great Mr. Locke should confidently assert, that the apostle here speaks of men nationally, and not personally, in reference to their eternal state; when the rejection of the Jewish nation, with the reservation only of "a remnant according to the election of grace," was the apostle's main subject, to illustrate which all the other examples are introduced. This remnant consisted of a small number of individuals, not of a nation; and the Gentile converts were individuals out of their several nations, forming, with the Jewish converts, the Christian church; and not whole nations, or one whole nation, chosen as a collective body, to succeed to the external advantages, which the nation of Israel had forfeited: and surely "the vessels of mercy before prepared unto glory," which the apostle next mentions, must have been chosen, not to external advantages, but to eternal life! (Notes, 8:28—31. 2 Thes. 2:13,14. 1 Pet. 1:1—5.)

23 And that he <sup>l</sup> might make known the riches of his glory on the vessels of mercy, which <sup>m</sup> he had afore prepared unto glory;

Note.—Suppose that God was pleased, (as in the instance of Pharaoh,) in order more conspicuously to display his powerful wrath against his enemies, to endure their provocations with patience and forbearance for a long time, till they had acted out the desperate wickedness of their hearts, and filled up the measure of their sins, and so become ripe for signal vengeance; what injustice could there be in this? In allusion to the potter's vessels, they were in themselves "vessels of wrath;" and their wicked dispositions and actions rendered them, "fitted for destruction." Nor could they have been preserved from destruction, but by an act of omnipotent power, as well as by the exercise of unmerited mercy: this, God was not bound, and did not see good, to bestow; and indeed they were too proud and wicked to ask or desire it, or even to accept it, or own their need of it. They "despised the riches of that long-suffering" which spared them; they "treasured up wrath" in the impotence of their hearts; and at length they received their due recompense. (Marg. Ref. h, i.—Note, 2:4—6.) On the other hand, should the Lord choose to display the abundance of his glorious power, truth, and love, in his dealings with some of the same lump, whom he had selected to be "vessels of mercy;" what was this to others? These were not in themselves more meet for holy felicity than the former: but he was pleased to prepare them before for it, by his regenerating and sanctifying grace; as well as to make them capable of actively glorifying him here on earth. But did his free love to them imply injustice to others? Their cause for gratitude was immense: but had those, who suffer no more than they deserve, any ground for complaint? while he withholds from none their due, he has surely a right "to do what he will with his own." (Marg. Ref. l, m.—Note, and P. O. Matt. 20:1—16, vv. 10—16.)—The different language used concerning "the vessels of wrath," and "the vessels of mercy," is of the greatest importance in stating this doctrine solidly and scripturally: the former are "fitted for destruction;" it is not said, that God had fitted them. For he saw them, in themselves, both deserving wrath, and fit for the place of torment, and the society of fallen angels: but God himself "had afore prepared the vessels of mercy," for that glory to which he intended to advance them. The term "vessels of mercy," implies, that they too had deserved wrath; and the "preparation for glory," shows that in themselves they had been unprepared. (Notes, Eph. 2:1—10. Tit. 3:3—7.)

Note.—(Note, 22, 23.) "The vessels of mercy," or converts to Christianity, had been called from among the Gentiles, as well as the Jews. (Marg. Ref. n, o.—Note, 8:28—31.) This gave great offence to the unbelieving Jews; yet their own prophets had expressly foretold it. Hosea had predicted, that they would "be beloved" of God, as his people, who "had not been beloved:" (Notes, Hos. 1:8—10. 2:21—23.) and Isaias had shown, that only a remnant would be saved from the innumerable multitudes of Israel; and that God would finish his work with that nation, in a righteous, but compendious manner; or by taking a short account of the chosen people among them, and consigning the rest to just destruction throughout the whole land: (Notes, Is. 10:21—23.)

and that except a seed, or "a very small remnant," had been left; the nation would have been destroyed like Sodom and Gomorrah. (Marg. Ref. p-d.—Note, Is. 1:7—9.)—A remnant of Israel, reserved by God for himself, while the rest were given up to just punishment, demonstrates, that the election, however understood, was personal, not national.—I will call, &c. (25,26.) Hos. 1:9. 2:23.—Not exactly, either from the LXX, or from the Hebrew; but the variations are immaterial as to the general meaning; yet, on the whole, more nearly according to the Hebrew.—Though the number, &c. (27—29.) The case is the same in these quotations. (Is. 1:9. 10:21—23.) Nothing can be more clear, than that the inspired writer intended to give the general sense of the scriptures, in such a translation into the Greek, as was proper; yet, as the Romans were chiefly conversant in the Septuagint, he used the words of that version, except when there was a good reason for varying from them.—<sup>4</sup>From comparing the original with the Septuagint, no one can deny, that the Greek interpreters have in fact rendered the passage very negligently, as far as words are concerned. 'Should any one ask, why the apostle nevertheless used that translation; I answer, that he did this very properly, because those to whom he wrote had been used to that translation; and that, as far as the sentiment is concerned, in support of which Paul adduced this testimony, the Greek interpreters had preserved it sufficiently faithful. Nor does it signify any other, either in the Hebrew or the Greek, than that God had determined to render the number of an ungrateful people extremely small.' *Beza. 30 What <sup>c</sup> shall we say then? That <sup>f</sup> the Gentiles, which <sup>g</sup> followed not after righteousness, have attained to righteousness, <sup>h</sup> even the righteousness which is of faith.

Note.—The apostle having shown, that both the purposes and predictions of God were fulfilled, in the rejection of the unbelieving Jews, and the calling of the Gentiles, here proceeds to show by what means the things had been effected; for this also illustrated the argument, that the Lord had acted righteously, and the Jews wickedly, in the whole concern. The Gentiles, who before lived in the grossest religious ignorance, idolatry, and vice, without at all "following after righteousness," had suddenly, through the surprising grace of God, been brought into a state of acceptance with Him, being called to partake of "the righteousness of God by faith." (Marg. Ref. e—h.—Notes, 1:17. 3:21—26. 4:9—12. Gal. 3:26—29. Phil. 3:8—11. Heb. 11:7. 2 Pet. 1:1,2.)—But Israel who had the law, both that which contained the rule of righteousness, and that which shadowed forth the way of justification; and who had sedulously paid regard to it as "the law of righteousness," had not attained to the law of righteousness." Not living up to their law, they were not justified, but condemned by it; yet, cleaving to it, they rejected Christ and his salvation. (Marg. Ref. i—l.—Note, 10:1—4.) Wherefore then had they failed of acceptance? Was it merely through God's decree? Or did he refuse to receive them, in the same way as the Gentiles were justified? That was by no means the case: but they refused to seek the blessing "by faith," as an unmerited favor; and persisted in claiming it "by the law," as a matter of right. This they did, "as it were, by the works of the law:" they did not think that they perfectly kept the law, but they expected to make up their deficiencies in one respect, by abounding in others; or by repentance, and amendment, and the legal sacrifices; or by superstitious additions, and observing the traditions of men. Thus they sought the blessing from that law, which denounced a curse upon them; and refused to trust in him who was raised up to bless them. At this stumbling-stone they fell, as it had been predicted that they would. Their obstinate pride and unbelief were the immediate cause of their ruin; and God had decreed, in righteousness, nothing more than to give them up to the lusts of their own hearts. (Marg. Ref. m—o.—Notes, Is. 8:11—15. 28:16. 1 Pet. 2:7,8.)—Some expositors think, that the apostle had reference to a race, in which the Jews, with all their advantages, were so far from coming in before the Gentiles, that they were left at a great distance behind: "for the last shall be first, and the first last." (Note, Matt. 19:29, 30.)—Mr. Locke and many others argue, that the apostle only meant, that the Gentiles here spoken of, as those whom God had called (24), had embraced the true religion; not that they were actually and individually brought into a state of salvation: but surely, if they "attained to righteousness, even the righteousness which is of faith," they were justified persons, "children of Abraham," children of God, and heirs of heaven; and they had before been spoken of "as vessels of mercy, prepared before unto glory." Though all, who professed the gospel, were not of this character, yet none else were partakers of "the righteousness which is of faith.”—It is also granted, as these learned expositors maintain, that the dealings of God with the Jews, and not his general conduct towards mankind at large, as to their eternal concerns, is the primary subject of the chapter: but the dispensations of God with Israel are explained, illustrated, and justified, on such principles, as establish in the clearest manner, the method of his dealings with mankind at large. And if we are not allowed to infer general conclusions, from the commands, testimonies, promises, and dispensations of God to Israel, in respect of individuals; it does not appear, how we can use the scriptures, or a great proportion of them at least, either for doctrinal or practical purposes; either for encouragement, warning, or “instruction in righteousness.”—“Whatsoever things were written aforetime, were written for our learning.”—“All these things happened unto them for ensamples; and they are written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world are come. Therefore let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall.” (Notes, 15:4—7. 1 Cor. 10:1—12.)—The Jews, as a nation, had outward privileges; and so have Christians, as a collective body. Most of them trusted in these outward privileges, and rejected the salvation of Christ; and so do the bulk of professed Christians. A remnant, however, believed and were saved, while the rest were hardened and rejected: the case is the same with professed Christians. This remnant was “the election of grace;” and so is the remnant of true Christians. (Notes, 24—29. 11:1—6. Matt. 11:25, 26. John 6: 36—40.)—Behold I lay, &c. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5.

The command of “loving our neighbor as ourselves;” and the example of Christ, require us to mourn over obstinate transgressors, especially when near to us “according to the flesh;” at the same time, that we vindicate the justice of God in his dealings with them. (Note, Luke 19:41—44. P. O. 28—45.) This sorrow and anguish of heart, springing from natural affection, will indeed alloy our present consolations: but they are active principles, exciting us to use proper means for the conversion of those around us, and to submit to hardship, reproach, loss, or suffering, in our compassionate endeavors for their good: and the more they rule in our hearts, and influence our conduct, the more we resemble him, who “was made a curse for us, to redeem us from the curse of the law.”—We cannot at present know the purposes of God respecting others: it will be soon enough for us to be “without natural affection,” when perfected in holiness; and to rejoice in the destruction of the enemies of God individually, when the event makes them known to us. In the mean time, insensibility to the eternal condition of our fellow creatures is contrary both to the love required by the law, and the mercy of the gospel: and the more we can appeal to our heart-searching Judge, through the testimony of his Spirit in our consciences, that we may sincerely pity, pray for, and would suffer any thing to save, our most virulent despisers and persecutors; the greater confidence we may use, in affectionately warning them of their danger, and of the delusions into which they are fallen. For no external forms, notions, means, promises, or intercourse with eminent saints, can profit such as have not themselves “the power of godliness.” Nay, if we stood related to Christ himself, “according to the flesh,” we should be in no degree profited by it; unless we submitted to him, and trusted, worshipped, and obeyed him, as “God over all, blessed for ever.” (Notes, Matt. 12:46—50. Luke 11:27,28. 2 Cor. 5:16.)

V. 6—21.

The whole scripture shows the difference between the professed Christian, and the real believer. Outward privileges are bestowed on many, who are not “the children of God.” These are “born of the Spirit;” according to the promise and “purpose of him,” who “worketh all things after the counsel of his own will;” and not because they were better, by nature, or of themselves, than others. For “the Lord hath mercy on whom he will have mercy;” and “it is not of him that willeth, or of him that runneth, but of God that showeth mercy.” (Notes, John 1:10—13. 3:7,8.) There is, however, abundant encouragement to the diligent use of the means of grace, which God has appointed. The promises, invitations, and exhortations of scripture, are perfectly consistent with the secret purposes of God. Where there is a willing mind, and humble diligence in seeking him, the blessing will certainly be given: and the happy believer will, in due time, ascribe even this willingness to electing love. But if men wilfully harden themselves in disobedience and impentence; God will show his power and vengeance in their destruction, and cause all their abused prosperity to increase their condemnation, and his own glory in it.—Who could have previously thought, that any of our race would have presumed to say, that “there is unrighteousness with God!” to quarrel with his judgments, and plead that “none hath resisted his will” or counsel! Shall criminals cite their offended Sovereign to their blasphemous tribunal? If they do, let them see to it, for “evil is before them.” “He that sitteth in heaven will deride” their folly, and “vex them in his hot displeasure.” He will proceed with his own plan, exercising his holy sovereignty as he sees good; and distinguishing between those who adore, and those who blaspheme, the depths which they cannot fathom: and he will number with the latter, all those who profess to believe the doctrines in question, and then take occasion from them to sin with greater presumption. But surely, all who love and fear God, however such truths may dazzle and dismay them, should reverently keep silence before him. And even if they hear them stated unscripturally or licentiously; they should take care what words they use in disputing against those who pervert the truth; that they may not appear to countenance the impieties of infidels and ungodly men. In short, modesty, caution, humility, and profound awe of the holy Majesty of God, should restrain and guide the tongues and pens of all, who speak or write on these subjects; however satisfied they may be with their own views of them: and every sentence which is written or spoken, in a manner, which on any supposition, imputes injustice to God, is a proof of the pride and irreverence of the writer or speaker.

V. 22—33.

The descendants of fallen Adam are in themselves "vessels of wrath," and God's long-suffering towards them is very wonderful: yet the practice and habits of disobedience renders them still more and more "fitted for destruction." But "the vessels of mercy" were originally of the same lump; and that new creation, by which they are "afore prepared unto glory," is as great a display of the riches of God's grace and mercy, as the inheritance which he freely bestows upon them. If we have experienced something of this change; surely, in our own case, we must allow that the Lord alone has made us to differ: (Notes, 1 Cor. 4: 6, 7. 15: 3—11.) and, instead of disputing against that free electing love, whence all our happiness flows, we should be employed in adoring his pardoning mercy and new-creating grace, or in "giving diligence to make our calling and election sure;" while those who know nothing of this change ought to be far otherwise employed, than in disputing either for or against this doctrine. Let them "strive to enter in at the strait gate," before the door be for ever shut; and leave the discussion of these abstruse questions to those, who are walking with God in the way to heaven.—As many of us have now obtained mercy, and are the people and children of the living God, who once were far off from him; so we may pray, and hope, and take encouragement to use diligently all proper means, that this may be the case with others throughout the earth. For alas! even among the vast number of professing Christians, it is to be feared that only "a remnant will be saved;" and the Lord will be righteous in the destruction of an immense majority. Blessed be his name, that he has left us also a seed of true believers, to preserve our land from being as Sodom and Gomorrah; yet this will not prevent very many individuals from perishing with still deeper destruction. While numbers "care for none of these things," and perish through open impiety: and while some are snatched from among them, by an unexpected conversion, and "pass from death to life," through the righteousness of faith and the grace of the gospel; others, who seem intent on "following after the law of righteousness," attain not to it, "because they seek it not by faith, but as it were by the works of the law;" by an indistinct observance of an imaginary rule, and expecting to atone for sin by forms, sacraments, alms, and superstitions, and by some general notion of Christ's making up the rest. On "this stumbling-stone" how many fall, and lose the race! Being offended at the humbling, levelling doctrines of free grace, they even make the precious Foundation for our hope, which God himself has laid, and on which "whoever trusts shall never be ashamed," (Note, 1 Cor. 3: 10—15.) "a Stone of stumbling, and a Rock of offence;" and so perish with an aggravated destruction.—From such a downfal, good Lord, deliver us! Amen.

CHAP. X.

The apostle again shows his earnest desire of Israel's salvation; testifying that they had zeal, dating wherein it was erroneous, and distinguishing between the righteousness of the law, and that of faith, 1—11. He maintains that Jews and Gentiles are, in this respect, on equal terms, 12, 13; that the gospel must be preached to the Gentiles in order to their believing in Christ, 14—16; and that the prophets had foretold the rejection of the Jews, and the calling of the Gentiles, 19—21.

Note.—Aware of the offence which his doctrine would give the Jews, and even many of the Jewish Christians; the apostle repeated his protestation, of his earnest desires, and fervent prayers, for the salvation of his people; notwithstanding their prejudices against him, and the persecutions which he had endured from them. (Note, 9: 1—3.)—He was also ready to bear testimony in behalf of the Jews, that they had "a zeal of God;" or a very great zeal, in things relating to God and religion. They were very zealous for the worship of God, according to the law of Moses, as they understood it; but this zeal was misguided and ignorant, founded on a misconstruction of the law itself, and of the national covenant; and so leading them fatally to oppose the kingdom and salvation of the promised Messiah. (Marg. Ref. a—d.—Notes, Acts 22: 1—5. 26: 9—11. Gal. 1: 11—14. Phil. 3: 1—7.) For they, not knowing the perfect justice of the divine character, law, and government; and the nature of that righteousness, which God had provided for the justification of sinners consistently with his own glory, had sought by various devices to "establish their own righteousness," as the meritorious ground of their justification; in doing which, they had refused to submit to the justice of God in their condemnation, and to seek righteousness as his free gift by faith alone. (Marg. Ref. e—g.—Notes, 1:17. 3:21—26. 9:30—33.)—The expression “establish their own righteousness,” seems to be taken from a person, who allows that his house is out of repair, and in some danger of falling; but will not be convinced that the foundation is destroyed, and that it must come down, and be entirely rebuilt on a new foundation. He therefore endeavors, by props and buttresses, and various repairs, to make the house stand; but all his expense and labor are thrown away; and, if he persist in his vain endeavor, it will be likely to fall down, and bury him in its ruins. (Note, Matt. 7:24—27.) Thus the Jews, (and immense numbers in every age do the same for substance though in varied forms,) when convinced of defects in their moral righteousness, endeavored to repair them, by ceremonial or superstitious observances: nor would they be convinced, that they were building on a false foundation; that they must totally give over these vain and perilous endeavors; and come for a gratuitous salvation to Christ by faith, even as the poor Gentiles did. To this they would not submit; because they did not know, that Christ was “the end” and scope of the law, for the justification of all believers. The strictness and sanction of the moral law showed men their need of salvation by grace, through faith; and the ceremonies shadowed forth Christ and his work, as fulfilling the righteousness, and bearing the curse, of the law: so that, even under the law, all who were justified before God obtained that blessing by faith, which interested them in the perfect righteousness of the promised and divine Redeemer. (Marg. Ref. h.—Notes, Is. 45:20—25. 51:4—6. 54:15—17. Jer. 23:5,6.)—Some argue, that if the apostle had in the preceding chapter meant, that the rejection of the Jewish nation was absolutely decreed, he would not have prayed for them; but it may be answered, that he knew a remnant was excepted: he did not know to what number this remnant might extend, and his “good will,” or benevolence, towards them was so strong, that he prayed for the conversion of Israelites, in a way which implied a longing desire that they all might be saved. Had it depended on him, this would have been the case: he prayed according to the knowledge which he had, and left secret things to God; adoring his wisdom and justice, even in those events which were contrary to the feelings and desires of his heart.—The author of these notes can answer for one, that his firm belief of personal election and the divine decrees, does not in the least interfere with his joining heartily in that prayer of our excellent liturgy, “That ‘it may please God to have mercy upon all men.’” (Notes, Jer. 14:10—12. 15:1.)

5 For Moses describeth the righteousness which is of the law, <sup>i</sup> That the man which doeth those things shall live by them.

7 Or, Who shall descend into the deep? (that is, <sup>n</sup> to bring up Christ again from the dead;)

8 But what saith it? <sup>o</sup> The word is nigh thee, even in thy mouth, and in thy heart: that is, <sup>p</sup> the word of faith, which we preach;

9 That <sup>q</sup> if thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, <sup>r</sup> and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved.

11 For the scripture saith, <sup>x</sup> Whosoever believeth on him shall not be ashamed.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—Moses had repeatedly shown the righteousness, which the law demanded of  $\epsilon$  man, in order to his justification; and his statement proved, that without a sinless obedience to every precept, no man could be accepted according to the law; and thus it effectually cut off all transgressors from every hope, in this way. (Marg. Ref. i.—Notes, Lev. 18:5. Deut. 27:26. Ez. 20:11. Luke 10:25—29. Gal. 3:10—14.) But “the righteousness of faith” might be introduced, as using the words of Moses, on an especial occasion. (Note, Deut. 30:11—14.)—The self-condemned sinner is not called on to perplex himself with inquiries, how this righteousness may be found; or to “say in his heart, Who shall ascend into heaven,” to fetch down one who may introduce such a righteousness? For Christ has already come down, and finished that work. Nor is he put upon inquiring, Who shall descend into the grave, or the place of departed spirits, to bring back the crucified Saviour from the dead? for that also was already done, and he was exalted at the right hand of the Father, to confer the blessing on all who in true faith applied to him for it. Nor was the information, respecting the means of obtaining it, at a distance, that men should travel into far countries to inquire after it, as philosophers often did, or as the queen of Sheba. (Note, 1 Kings 10:1,2.) On the contrary, it "was nigh to them," in "the word of faith," which the ministers of Christ were sent to preach; it was in the mouth of all who professed the gospel, and in the hearts of all who believed it. (Marg. Ref. k—p.) In short, if a man confessed faith in Jesus, as the Lord and Saviour of lost sinners, and really "believed in his heart, that God had raised him from the dead," in attestation of having accepted his atonement, he should certainly be saved, by the righteousness of Christ imputed to him through faith. (Marg. Ref. q, r.—Note, 4:23—25.)—That faith, by which a sinner is made "the righteousness of God in Christ," has its seat in "the heart" of a humble penitent, and produces cordial desires after him and love to him: and the bold confession of his name and truth, among enemies, and in the face of danger, evidences a man's faith to be genuine, and gives a sure hope of complete salvation, according to the prophecy before referred to. (Marg. Ref. s—x.—Notes, 9:30—33. Is. 28:16.)—The distinction between "confessing with the mouth," and "believing in the heart," shows that the apostle was discoursing, not of a mere profession of Christianity, but of the genuine sincerity of him, who made that profession. (Notes, Mark 16:14—16. 1 Pet. 3:21,22.) On the other hand, those who refused to make this open profession, in times of persecution, had no reason to conclude, that in their hearts they truly believed in Christ, for righteousness and salvation. 'Justification 'is here expressly ascribed to faith, not as including works, but only as being that principle, which, when it is cordial and sincere, will 'certainly produce them.' Whitby. (Note, Matt. 10:32,33.)—The man which doeth, &c. (5) Nearly from the LXX, which accord to the Hebrew. (Lev. 18:5.)—Say not, &c. (6—8.) The apostle here takes the general sentiment, and expresses it in his own language; which is not exactly according either to the LXX or the Hebrew. (Deut. 30:12—14.)

13 For <sup>c</sup> whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved.

14 How then <sup>d</sup> shall they call on him in whom they have not believed? <sup>e</sup> and how shall they believe in him of whom they have not heard? and how shall they hear without a preacher?

17 So then <sup>o</sup> faith cometh by hearing, <sup>p</sup> and hearing by the word of God.

Note.—In respect of the subject of which the apostle was discoursing, there was "no difference" between Jews and Gentiles: for as none of them could be justified by their works, or saved in unbelief; so the infinite Creator and Governor of the world, being rich and plenteous in mercy towards all who humbly call on him for salvation, would never exclude from justification any who believed in his Son. (Marg. Ref. y—a.—Notes, 3:27—31.) Thus the prophet had foretold, concerning the times of the Messiah, that "whosoever should call on the name of the Lord would be saved." (Notes, Joel 2:28—32. Acts 2:14—21. 9:10—14, 17—22.) The Jews in general called upon JEHOVAH for temporal deliverance, and eternal salvation, even while they rejected Christ; but they called in vain: this therefore could not be the intent of the prophecy. By "calling on the name of the Lord," we must understand, either invoking the Lord Jesus personally, as the incarnate Word, the co-equal Son of God, "God manifest in the flesh;" or calling upon the Father, by faith in the Son, and through his intercession: but the former sense best accords to the apostle's argument, and is by far the most obvious construction of the words. All believers thus "called on the name of the Lord Jesus;" (Marg. Ref. c.—Notes, 1 Cor. 1:1,2.) and none else would, that is, humbly and sincerely: therefore all, whether Jews or Gentiles, who thus sought help from him, would be saved. But how should any call on the Lord Jesus, the divine Saviour, who had not believed in him? Or how could any believe in him, who had never heard of him or his salvation? Or how could the Gentiles hear the things pertaining to Christ, if none of the Jews, to whom they were immediately revealed, were sent by God, and by his church, to preach to them? Why then should the Jews blame the apostle and others, for engaging in this needful and benevolent work, to which God called them? (Marg. Ref. d—f.—Note, 1 Thes. 2:13—16.)—The necessity and importance of preaching the gospel had been stated in strong terms by the prophet. (Marg. Ref. g—i.—Notes, Is. 52:7,8. John 12:37—41.)—He had poetically described even the feet of those who proclaimed the gospel of peace, to be beautiful: and though the Gentiles had not generally welcomed the salvation of Christ, any more than the Jews, so as to receive it with an obedient faith; yet that too had been intimidated by the same prophet, when he expressed his grief, and surprise, at men's general inattention to the glad tidings of salvation by a suffering Messiah. (Marg. Ref. k—n.—Note, Is. 53:1.) Even the phrase which he used, when he called the gospel "our report," confirmed the foregoing argument, that faith generally came by men's hearing a report of Christ, brought to them by the faithful preaching of the word of God. This is the means which God has appointed, and chiefly blessed for this purpose, and it is therefore man's duty to use it in expectation of his blessing.—The Christian church seems, during many ages, to have forgotten her obligation to send the gospel to the nations; but it has in our days been brought to remembrance. May it be acted on more and more!—The manner, in which the apostle applies the words to Christ, which Isaiah spoke of JEHOVAH, forms a strong proof of our Lord's Deity.—Feet, &c. (15) "The feet of those who have travelled far, in a hot country, through rough and dusty roads, present a spectacle naturally offensive: ... nevertheless, the consideration, that the persons themselves are, to us, the messengers of peace and felicity, would make us behold with delight this indication of their embassy. Haud indecoro pulvere sordidos. Horace." Campbell.—The whole passage most clearly shows, that without calling on Christ none can be saved, that without faith none can call on him; and without the preaching, or publication in some way of the gospel, none can believe in him.—The awful state of the heathen nations, and our imperious duty towards them, can hardly be more strongly stated, nor the opinion of those who argue that multitudes will be saved by Jesus, who never heard of his name, more energetically reprobated.—How beautiful, &c. (15) From the Hebrew, omitting, "upon the mountains." 18 But I say, <sup>p</sup> Have they not heard? Yes verily, <sup>q</sup> their sound went into all the earth, and their words <sup>r</sup> unto the ends of the world.

19 But <sup>s</sup> I say, Did not Israel know? <sup>t</sup> First Moses saith, I will provoke you to jealousy by them that are no people, and by a <sup>u</sup> foolish nation I will anger you.

20 But Esaias is <sup>x</sup> very bold, and saith, <sup>y</sup> I was found of them that sought me not;

21 But to Israel he saith, <sup>a</sup> All day long I have stretched forth my hands unto <sup>b</sup> a disobedient and gainsaying people.

Note.—As then, the "hearing of the report" concerning Christ was absolutely necessary to faith in him, and salvation by him; could it be said, that the Jews had not had an opportunity of hearing it? Indeed the gospel had been so generally and extensively diffused, that the words of David, respecting the instructions conveyed to all nations, by the luminaries of heaven, (as typical of "the Sun of righteousness,") might be well applied to what had already taken place. (Marg. Ref. p—r.—Note, Ps. 19:3—6.)—The Jews especially had almost universally heard the gospel. The apostles, the seventy disciples, and others, by the express command of the Lord, preached in the cities and villages of Judea and Galilee, for a long time, before they went to the Gentiles: and even Paul, the apostle of the Gentiles, constantly first preached to the Jews, in every city whither he went. Very few of that nation therefore could plead, that they had had no opportunity of hearing this report: and their unbelief was the effect, not of ignorance or want of instruction, but of obstinate enmity against the truth. Again, could Israelites plead, that no intimations had previously been given, that God intended to cast them off for their unbelief and disobedience, and to take others in their stead? Even Moses, in that prophetic song which all the people were commanded to learn throughout their generations, had represented JEHOVAH declaring, that he would excite them to jealousy by those who had been no people to him, and raise their indignation by his favors shown to a nation, which had been despised as foolish, because idolatrous. (Marg. Ref. s—u.—Notes, Deut. 31:19. 32:21.) This had been most remarkably accomplished, in the virulent opposition to the gospel, which the calling of the Gentiles had excited in the Jews; when it should have stirred them up to a pious emulation, not to be surpassed in faith and holiness by those who had before been so ignorant and far from God.—Isaiah also, in very bold language, which must have given very great offence to his contemporaries, had introduced JEHOVAH declaring that he was found as a Saviour, and acceptably worshipped, by those who just before had not so much as sought for him; and that he had freely bestowed his favor and conferred his special grace on those, who had not previously made any inquiries after him: but in respect of Israel, he declared, that "he had stretched out his hands" full of blessings, and with most earnest and affectionate invitations, to a "disobedient and perverse people." ## PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

Faithful ministers bear most affectionate good will to those, from whom they receive the greatest injuries; and offer their fervent and persevering prayers for the salvation of the very persons, against whom they denounce the wrath of God, if they persist in unbelief.—Careless and shameless profligates, infidels, and blasphemers are not the only persons who through the broad road to destruction, but many also who have “a zeal for God” and religion. (Note, Matt. 7:13,14.) While therefore we should inculcate earnestness in that most important concern; we must also insist upon the absolute necessity of its being regulated by the word of God; without which even the most self-denying earnestness can do no more, than speciously deceive and ruin the souls of men.—Sinners could never persist in their vain endeavors to repair the baseless edifice of “their own righteousness;” if they knew either the justice of God as a Governor, or his righteousness as a Saviour. (Notes, 1:17—20. John 16:8—11.) But being, through heedlessness, pride, prejudice, and carnal enmity, ignorant both of the law and the gospel, they stand out against partial convictions; they do not allow the justice of the sentence denounced against them, as sinners deserving “the wrath of God;” and they will not submit to be saved by “the righteousness of faith,” in the same way with the meanest and most criminal of the species. Manifest are their devices and endeavors to “establish their own righteousness;” but all their labor is lost, and their souls continue in the most imminent danger: for in opposition to all other methods of obtaining the divine favor, whether devised by ignorance, superstition, philosophy, enthusiasm, or grave morality, we must still insist upon it, that “Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth;” and that every unbeliever remains under “the curse of the law;” and “the wrath of God.” If a man object to this, and adduce the difference between moral and ceremonial obedience, and argue that the former may help to justify a man though the latter cannot: let him hear “Moses describe the righteousness of the law,” and then let him inquire whether he can claim eternal life according to it. Let him take the moral “law of God,” (for rules which men prescribe, to themselves and to each other, are out of the question;) and, having produced a sinless obedience to it, through the whole of his continuance here, in thought, word, and deed, let him then demand the reward as a debt. But if this be a desperate attempt; let him submit to the degradation of a criminal, and apply for pardon to the clemency of his offended Lord, and for eternal life as his free “gift through Jesus Christ,” and by faith in him. (Note, 6: 21—23. P. O. 16—23.)—The humble, trembling sinner has, however, no cause for discouragement. “The righteousness of faith,” as it were, invites him to accept of it; the Surety has finished his obedience and atonement, and is risen and exalted to be our all-prevailing Advocate. (Notes, 8:32—39. Heb. 7:23—23. 9: 24—26. 1 John 2:1,2.) Nor need we cross the seas, or explore far distant climes, in quest of divine knowledge: this is brought nigh to us in the gospel; and if we receive it by living faith in our hearts, and confess that faith with our mouths in this evil world, without doubt the blessing is ours. But we should not trust in a faith, of which we are afraid or ashamed to make an open confession: much less ought we to depend on any mere confession of faith, or assent to divine truths, which we do not “believe in our hearts.” For no faith is justifying, which is not efficacious in sanctifying the heart, and regulating all its affections in subservency to the love of Christ. (Notes, Jam. 2:14—26.) Of such a faith no sinner shall be ashamed before God; and he ought therefore to glory in it before man. (Note, 5:3—5. Is. 45:15—17, 23—25. Joel 2:26,27, 1 John 2:26—29.)

V. 12—21.

In the great concerns of eternal salvation there is now “no difference” between one nation and another: for our rich and gracious Lord most willingly regards the desires of all “who call upon him;” and none receive the less, because of the numbers who share the blessings with them. As therefore faith (whence all true prayer proceeds,) comes “by hearing the word of God:” we should take care to be found among those who hear, believe, and obey the gospel; and we should zealously and diligently endeavor to communicate the same blessing to others, even to “the ends of the earth,” with all the influence and talent which we possess; and with every self-denying exertion of which we are capable: that the “Sun of righteousness” may diffuse his healing beams, wherever the sun in the firmament gives light to mankind.—When we hear of the success of the gospel among the ignorant, the barbarous, or the profligate; instead of being displeased, as Pharisees are, we should cordially adore the riches and power of the grace of God, in its being thus “found of them who sought him not;” and we should excite ourselves and each other to a holy jealousy and increasing diligence; lest we should be left behind by those, who once were so far below us in spiritual advantages. Thus we shall obtain the assurance, that we are not of that immense number, to whom the Lord still says, “All day long have I stretched out my hands to a disobedient and gainsaying people,” a people both unbelieving and disobedient. (Notes, Heb. 3:14—19. 1 Pet. 2:7,8.)

CHAP. XI.

The apostle shows, that God had not as cast off Israel, but that a remnant would be saved, “according to the election of grace,” by grace, not by works, 1—6; while the rest would be blinded, as foretold by the prophets, 7—10. He predicts that this exclusion would not be final; and states the consequences to the Gentiles, both of the fall of the Jews, and of their recovery, 11—15. He cautions the Gentile converts not to boast against the Jews, but humbly to profit by this example of God's severity and goodness; and foretells glorious times, which would at length arrive, 16—32. He adores the depths of God's wisdom, and the glory of his unsearchable judgments, his unmerited all-sufficiency, and his universal and absolute sovereignty, 33—36.

I SAY then, <sup>a</sup> Hath God cast away his people? <sup>b</sup> God forbid. <sup>c</sup> For I also am an Israelite, of the seed of Abraham, of the tribe of Benjamin.

3 Lord, <sup>g</sup> they have killed thy prophets, and <sup>h</sup> digged down thine altars; and I am left alone, and they seek my life.

4 But what saith the answer of God unto him? <sup>i</sup> I have reserved to myself seven thousand men, who have not bowed the knee to the image of <sup>k</sup> Baal.

5 Even so then <sup>l</sup> at this present time also there is a remnant according to the <sup>m</sup> election of grace.

6 And <sup>n</sup> if by grace, then is it no more of works: otherwise grace is no more grace. But if it be of works, then is it no more grace: otherwise work is no more work.

Note.—The apostle here supposes, that in consequence of what he had stated, (Note, 10:18—21.) it would be inquired, whether God had utterly “cast away” his chosen people, Israel; and so failed of performing his promises to their fathers. This consequence, as deduced from his doctrine, he decidedly disavowed. Indeed the Lord could not so properly be said to have “cast them away,” as they to have “cast him off,” through their determined opposition to the kingdom and salvation of the promised Messiah, by which they forfeited their privileges. This appeared from the ready reception given to all those Jews, who were willing to become the disciples of Christ: of this, the apostle himself was a most remarkable instance; for, being a descendant of Abraham, and once a furious persecutor of the church, he was now become the apostle of Christ to the Gentiles. (Marg. Ref. a—c.—Notes, Phil. 3:1—7. 1 Tim. 1:12—14.) God had not therefore “cast away his people, whom he had foreknown,” as in due time to be called and justified, to whom especially his promises had respect; though he had left the rest to fall by their unbelief. (Marg. Ref. d.—Note, 8:28—31.) But, as ΙΕΡΟΥΣΑΛΗΜ had “reserved to himself” (by his special influence and agency,) a considerable remnant in the days of Elijah, when the prophet was ready to conclude that “he alone was left” to serve him, and used such words in prayer, as might be considered as “interceding against Israel;” (Marg. and Marg. Ref. e—k.—Notes, 1 Kings 19:10—14, 18.) so there was a remnant reserved of many ten thousand Jews, yea, a far greater proportion than was generally supposed, at that very period, when the nation was cast off from being the people of God. This remnant was reserved according to “the election of grace:” not because they were less undeserving of such favor than others: but because God was pleased to have mercy on them, for reasons which he had not seen good to reveal: otherwise they too would have perished in unbelief. (Note, 9:15—23.) If then this election was “of grace,” it could not be “of works,” either performed or foreseen; as this would imply that something naturally in the objects chosen determined the Lord's preference, and that it did not originate from his grace or unmerited mercy. For if, in any sense or degree, “it were of works,” it would in part at least be of debt, and not of entire free favor; otherwise “work,” as it stands related to election and justification, would lose its very nature. For an entire free favor must be absolutely distinct from a reward, conferred in consequence of some work performed: as the price of one farthing, paid for what is worth a thousand pounds, must in exact propriety of speech, essentially distinguish it from an entirely free gift. (Marg. Ref. l—n.—Note, 4:4,5.)—This text is so decisive on the subject, that great pains have been taken to explain it away: but really the arguments of the most able and learned men, on the other side, prove nothing so much as the weakness of their cause. I shall therefore only observe in general; that in fact, those are not always or even generally called, who, to our apprehension, are best disposed to perform good works, but the contrary, as the examples recorded in scripture alone undeniably demonstrate; (Notes, Matt. 19:29,30. 21:28—32. Luke 13:22—30.) that every truly good disposition, in a fallen creature, must be the effect, and cannot therefore be the cause, of the grace of God bestowed on him; that God did not act without reason in choosing one rather than another, though we are not made acquainted with his reasons; and that the display of the infinite riches of his mercy, the omnipotence of his grace, and the glory of his own sovereignty, in converting the most unlikely persons in the world, are far more probable reasons of his choice, than any foreseen comparative goodness of natural disposition in those who are saved, above those that perish.—The election of grace. (5) ‘Not those who chose grace, but those whom grace chose; that is, those whom God freely chose. Neither would “grace be grace,” if we were in the smallest degree chosen for our foreseen good works; nor would “work be work,” if in any measure it needed the help of grace.’ Beza.—They have killed, &c. (3,4.) The first part comes nearer to the Hebrew, than to the LXX: the second, ‘is plainly another translation, and seems to be a better one, of the Hebrew.’ Randolph. (1 Kings 19:10,18.)

10 Let <sup>a</sup> their eyes be darkened, that they may not see, <sup>b</sup> and bow down their back alway. [Practical Observations.]

Note.—What then was the precise state of the Jewish nation? In general they had not obtained that "justification unto life," which they sought for; because they clave to their own devices, and rejected the gospel of God: (Notes, 9:30—33. 10:1—4.) but "the election" or the chosen remnant among them, had obtained it, while "the rest were blinded;" so that the rejection of the latter was the punishment of their sins; but the calling of the former was neither the consequence, nor the reward, of their own works. "The election," here mentioned, as distinct from Israel, God's chosen people, (that is, an election within an election,) clearly marks the difference between an election of a people to special external privileges, and a personal choice of individuals to eternal life: and it refutes unanswerably the reasonings of those, who would confine all these scriptures to the former kind of election, and exclude the latter. (Marg. Ref. o—q.)—This judicial blindness of the enemies of Christ, had been clearly foretold; and might have been previously expected. (Notes, Deut. 29:4. Ps. 69:22—28. Is. 6:9,10. 29:9—12. Acts 1:20—22.) These scriptures have already been explained in this sense: but we may add, upon the version here given of David's words, that the provision made for the souls of the Jews (as well as their temporal plenty,) was in righteous judgment, made the occasion of their being more deeply ensnared in guilt, and sinking under more dreadful condemnation, as the recompense of their unbelief; till at length they were totally blinded, and given up as slaves to the oppression of their enemies, to be bowed down continually with the heavy burdens laid upon them: an emblem of their base and ruinous bondage to sin and Satan. (Marg. Ref. r—b.—Notes, Lev. 26:31—45. Deut. 28:15—68. Dan. 9:25—27. Matt. 21:40—44. 23:29—36. 27:24,25. Acts 3:22,23. 7:51—53. 1 Thes. 2:13—16.)—God hath given, &c. (5) 'This by no means implies, that God infuses 'any new viciousness; but that he, as a just 'Judge, delivers up those, who are destitute of 'his grace, unto Satan and to their own lusts, 'to be more and more blinded.' Beza. This venerable reformer certainly adopts, what is generally called the supra-lapsarian doctrine; and ventures on expressions, which few modern Calvinists (as they are called,) would subscribe: yet he by no means admits those consequences, which numbers, who "speak evil of what they understand not," indiscriminately charge on all, who hold the doctrine of personal election to eternal life. (Notes, Ex. 4:21. 2 Thes. 2:8—12.) The apostle seems to have given the sense of the several prophecies to this effect referred to, rather than the exact words from the Septuagint, or a literal translation from the Hebrew. 'The Septuagint, after the usual way 'of this translation, puts the optative,' (or rather, the imperative,) 'for what is, in the 'Hebrew, the future.' Randolph. This is, I apprehend, often done very improperly: but here the context requires it: as several verbs, in the same passage, are imperative. 15 For if <sup>n</sup> the casting away of them be <sup>o</sup> the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be <sup>p</sup> but life from the dead?

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The apostle had shown that Israel was not totally “cast off;” (Note, 1—6.) and he next inquired, whether the nation in general had so stumbled, as finally to be excluded from all further share in the blessings covenanted to their fathers: or whether God had no further end in that mysterious dispensation, than merely their fall and ruin. He would by no means admit either of these suppositions: for it actually appeared, that the Lord intended, “through the unbelief” of the Jews, to communicate his salvation to the Gentiles. The persecution of the Christians in Judea drove them into other regions: and the Jews, in every place rejecting the gospel, excited the preachers more speedily and openly to address the Gentiles; by which means, very large multitudes had been “turned from idols to serve the living God.” (Notes, Acts 8:1, 4. 11:19—21. 13:42—48. 1 Thes. 1:9, 10.) Yet even this was suited to excite the Jews to a holy jealousy, and an emulation with the Gentile worshippers, in zeal for the service of JEHOVAH, and earnestness in seeking the blessings of the Messiah’s kingdom; though it too generally had the contrary effect, through their pride and prejudices. (Marg. Ref. c—e.—Note, 10:18—21.) If then “their fall” had been overruled for “the enriching of the world” in general with the blessings of the gospel; if the diminution of the numbers of that long-favored people, by the exclusion of so large a part of them from the visible church, and the subsequent judgments inflicted on them, was the occasion of communicating such rich blessings, to immense numbers of the benighted Gentiles; how much more would their conversion, when the whole nation should, in one full body, acknowledge their long despised Messiah! For this, they have ever since been preserved a distinct people, almost by a continued miracle: (Notes, Num. 23:9. Jer. 30:10, 11.) and as their conversion will fulfil so very many ancient prophecies concerning their restoration, and will probably be effected by the fulfilment of many other prophecies; so it will doubtless exceedingly conduce to the conversion of the remaining heathen nations. (Marg. Ref. f, g.—Notes, Lev. 26:40—42. Deut. 4:29—31. 30:1—10. Is. 11:11—16. 63:15—19. 64: Jer. 32:39—41. Ez. 34:23—31. 36:25—27, 31. 37:25—28. 39:23—29. Hos. 3:4, 5. Joel 3:9—21. Am. 9:13—15. Mic. 5:7—9. 7:18—20. Zeph. 3:14—17. Zech. 8:20—23. 10:5—12. 12:6—14.) Paul, addressing himself to the Gentile converts, (though he was aware that many both of the Jewish Christians and the unconverted Jews would read his arguments,) spoke in the character of “the apostle of the Gentiles,” by the special designation of Christ; and aimed to commend and magnify that office, as honorable to himself, and most important for the good of mankind. At the same time, by a most judicious and delicate turn, he represented his zeal for the conversion of the Gentiles, as animated by the desire of stirring up his brethren the Jews, whom he regarded as “his own flesh,” to emulate their faith and aspire to their privileges; that thus he might be instrumental in saving some of them also, though he knew that the sentence denounced upon the nation was irreversible. (Marg. Ref. h—m.)—The English word “provoke,” being now fixed in common use to the idea of exciting indignation, is very apt to perplex the reader’s mind, and to prevent his clearly seeing, that the apostle spoke of exciting them to holy, and not to unholy passions; the latter indeed was generally the event of his conduct, but contrary to his intentions. (Note, Heb. 10:23—25.)—As, therefore, the righteous rejection of the unbelieving Jews had proved the occasion of so large a multitude of the Gentiles, throughout the world, being reconciled to God and walking at peace with him; what would their future reception into the church introduce, but such a change as would resemble a general resurrection of the ‘dead in sin to a ‘life of righteousness,’ in every part of the world; and a proportionable increase of spiritual life to all who before had believed? This event will accomplish so many prophecies, in so open and signal a manner, that infidelity in every form must be finally confuted and silenced: and the attention of the most heedless must be excited to the astonishing display of the power of God, in performing his word: and, as “he delighteth in mercy,” he will effectually concur with these impressions, by pouring out his Holy Spirit to convert the nations, and to render genuine Christianity universally triumphant; probably to a very great degree by ministers and missionaries of converted Israel. (Marg. Ref. n—p.—Notes, Rev. 19:11—21. 20:1—6.)

Note.—The apostle here speaks of Israel, as the visible church of God, the repository of his oracles and ordinances; the vineyard which he had inclosed and planted, but which he was now about to leave desolate. (Notes, Is. 5:1—7.) The attentive reader will readily perceive, that relative holiness, or consecration to God, is here exclusively meant. “The first-fruits” of the dough, being presented to God, sanctified, as it were, the whole lump to the use of his people: (Marg. Ref. q.—Note, Lev. 23:10—14.) thus the patriarchs, “the first-fruits” of Israel, being chosen and set apart with their seed after them, as “a holy people to the Lord,” through all their generations; a measure of this relative sanctity attached to their posterity, notwithstanding their rebellions and visitations; in consequence of which, all their males were circumcised on the eighth day, as the professed people and worshippers of JEHOVAH. (Notes, 1 Cor. 7:10—14.) But another similitude more aptly illustrated this subject: “if the root” of the tree were “holy,” the branches must be supposed to be the same. Now Abraham was, as it were, the root of the visible church in all subsequent ages. After Ishmael and the sons of Keturah had been broken off, the tree grew up in Isaac: then Esau being broken off, it shot forth abundance of branches, in Jacob and his twelve sons. When any Gentiles were converted, or proselyted, they were “grafted into this tree” by circumcision, as long as the legal dispensation lasted; (but by baptism after the Christian dispensation entered;) and they, with their posterity, were from that time considered as branches of the tree, a part of the visible church as springing from Abraham. (Marg. Ref. r—u.) Notwithstanding all former rebellions, the Jews were the branches of this tree, till as a nation they rejected the Messiah; (though the most of the ten tribes had long before been broken off;) but after that, their relation to Abraham and to God, was, as it were, suspended. They were broken off from the olive-tree in immense multitudes: they were cast out of the church, as the children of the bond-woman, or as profane Esau: (Notes, Gal. 4:21—31. Heb. 12:15—17.) neither they, nor their posterity any longer retained even the outward seal of the covenant; for circumcision lost its validity, and baptism became the sign of regeneration, and “the seal of the righteousness of faith:” and they were thenceforth deprived of the ordinances of God. (Notes, 4:9—12. John 15:1—5.) At the same time, the Gentiles “were grafted” into this tree, in their room: by professing faith in Christ, and being baptized into his name, they were admitted into the visible church of God, and attained a relative holiness; they were favored with the means of grace, and the ordinances of God, “for their good, and that of their children after them,” as the Jews formerly had been; and multitudes, who had been the branches of the wild unfruitful olive-tree, were thus made heirs of Abraham’s faith, holiness, and blessedness. (Notes, Gal. 3:26—29. Heb. 6:16—20.) Yet the Gentile Christians ought by no means to copy the Jews by becoming proud of this distinction; or boasting over those who had been broken off to make room for them. But if any of them were disposed to do this, they should recollect that they were not the root of this well-cultured, fruitful tree; nor had they naturally sprung from it, but of free grace had been grafted in to share its advantages. Abraham’s race had derived no spiritual good from them; but they derived all from Abraham’s race: and indeed all the knowledge of the true God and of true religion in the world to this day is derived from them.—The Gentile converts might indeed say, that “the natural branches had been broken off” to make way for them, and it was true that God had thus preferred them; yet it was not on account of their works, but of entirely free grace. “Through unbelief,” the effect of pride, “the Jews had been broken off,” and “through faith” the Gentiles had been grafted in: they ought therefore to beware of self-confidence, self-preference, and every kind of pride or ambition; lest, having only a dead faith, and an empty profession, they should apostatize from God and forfeit their privileges. For if he had not spared the natural branches; they ought surely to fear lest they too should be broken off. (Marg. Ref. x—f.)—This doubtless refers to the collective body of professing Christians, and not to individual believers: though the latter are preserved, through humility and holy fear. It has also a peculiar prophetic energy, when we consider it as addressed to the Roman church, which so soon after, attempting to domineer over other churches, to be the metropolis of the Christian world, and at length to be infallible, fell through pride and presumption; till it became “the mother of harlots, and of abominations of the earth.” (Notes, Rev. 17:1—6.)—It is obvious to observe, that, though the illustration of grafting excellently suited the apostle’s purpose, yet the effect, in the case before us, is the reverse of that in natural grafting: for there, the good cion communicates its changing efficacy to the wild stock; here, the stock imparts its efficacy to the corrupt branches, which by divine power are grafted into it.—The apostle’s reasoning, in this place, strongly evinces the oneness of the visible church under every dispensation; and the change of the initiatory ordinance since the coming of Christ is manifest: his statement therefore implies more substantial arguments in favor of infant-baptism, than has generally been supposed.—“We ought indeed to glory in God; ... but not so as to despise the Jews, whom it becomes us rather to excite to a holy emulation. ... And they doubtless do suffer, and will suffer, the punishment of this neglect-

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—Instead of glorying over the rejected Jews, or glorying in themselves, the Gentile converts ought to contemplate, with admiration, awe, and gratitude, the unmerited "goodness," and the righteous "severity" of God:

on the fallen Jews, "severity," but to themselves, most astonishing "goodness." Yet it was proper to add, "if they continued in that goodness" that is, if in humble faith they received, and lived in persevering dependence on the grace displayed in the gospel. (Marg. Ref.

either personally or collectively, were unbelieving and presumptuous, and renounced the truth, they too would be "cut off." Whereas if the Jews were not obstinate in their unbelief, they would be "grafted in again;" which might be easily accomplished by the divine power. For if God had taken the Gentiles, as "branches of the wild olive-tree," the descendants of those, who for so many ages had been ignorant and licentious idolaters; and had, by his word and Spirit, "grafted them in" among his own people and worshippers; doubtless he would much more in due time graft the Jews, the natural branches, into their own Olive-Tree.—
This was spoken prophetically, both respecting the apostasy of the Roman church, and the future conversion of the Jews. (Marg. Ref. k, l.—Note, 2 Thes. 2:3,4.)—"This "grafting in 'again," seems to import, that the Jews shall 'be a flourishing nation again, professing Chris-'tianty in the land of promise; for that is to
'be reinstated again in the promise made to
'Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. This, St. Paul
'might, for good reasons, be withheld from

30 For <sup>c</sup> as ye in times past have not believed God, yet have now <sup>d</sup> obtained mercy <sup>e</sup> through their unbelief;

31 Even so have these also now not * believed, <sup>f</sup> that through your mercy they also may obtain mercy.

32 For <sup>g</sup> God hath † concluded them all in unbelief, <sup>h</sup> that he might have mercy upon all.

Note.—Perhaps the apostle was aware, that “the mystery of iniquity already wrought,” in the church at Rome; and therefore labored the more to check its fatal progress. (Note, 2 Thes. 2:5—7.) He would not have them remain “ignorant” of the mysterious purposes of God, respecting his ancient people, lest their present advantageous distinction should render them proud of their own wisdom. (Notes, 12:14—16. Prov. 3:5—8. 26:12,16. Is. 5:21.) The Lord, in righteous sovereignty, had permitted “blindness in part” to happen even to Israel: not a partial, but a total blindness in spiritual things; but it extended only to a part of the nation, for “the election” was preserved from it. (Note, 7—10.) This would continue to be the case, till the happy period arrived, for the conversion of the fulness of the Gentiles. (Note, Luke 21:20—24.) In the intermediate ages, immense numbers would be gathered into the church; but, about the time of the last great harvest of the nations, “the blindness” will be removed from Israel, and the nation saved from its rejected and dispersed state, and be brought in a body to embrace the gospel: probably it will be restored to the holy land, and most of the Jews at least will become true believers. (Marg. Ref. m—r.—Note, 11—15.) This accords to a prophecy, which predicts the spiritual coming of Christ, to “turn away from” the nation of “Israel ungodliness,” impenitence, unbelief, and enmity to his kingdom and salvation; that, by thus removing the guilt and power of their sins, his covenant may again be ratified with them. (Marg. Ref. s—u.—Note, Is. 59:20,21.)—The Jews indeed by their rejection of the gospel, and their indignation at its being preached to the Gentiles, were considered as “enemies” to God; which was overruled for the calling of the Gentiles through special love to them; yet, in regard to the original election of that people in Abraham, and the immense number of elect persons, who are yet to spring from them, they are still to be favored, for the sake of their pious fathers. (Notes,

Is. 6:13. 65:8—10. Matt. 24:21,22.) For God will, in his persevering love and kindness to that race through all ages, show that, however he is said to repent of his threatenings and judgments, and is thus better than his word; yet he never repents, or is said to repent, of his special gifts, or distinguished favors, promised to fallen man, or conferred on him. So that, as the Gentiles, who had once no knowledge of God, had at length “obtained mercy, through the unbelief” of the Jews, and by means of preachers of that nation; even so the unbelieving Jews might at length “obtain mercy, through the mercy” shown to the Gentiles, and at length receive the gospel from them, and from preachers raised up among them. For God had alternately left both of them in unbelief, shut up as in a prison, for the appointed time; in order, that at length he might have mercy on them all, by bringing both Jews and Gentiles, even all nations, to the knowledge of his salvation by faith in Jesus Christ. (Marg. Ref. y—h.)—The principal conversion of Jews, in the times of the apostles, had taken place before this epistle was written; and it is evident that the conversion predicted is yet future.—There shall come, &c. (26,27.) Not exactly, either from the Sept. or the Hebrew; yet the general meaning is the same, and the variation does not at all affect the argument. It is, however, most evident, that the apostle, even when writing to the Gentiles, who in general had no copy of the Scriptures but the Septuagint, did not uniformly quote from it. (Is. 59:20,21.)

Note.—“The apostle breaks forth in this exclamation, as filled with astonishment, at the ‘exceedingly admirable wisdom of God; which, he also thus teaches, should be piously and reverently adored, and not profanely and curiously ‘searched into, beyond the boundaries of revelation.’ Beza.—St. Paul had gone as far, in unravelling, illustrating, and vindicating, the mysterious purposes and decrees of God, as was suitable or profitable: yet he well knew, that much darkness and difficulty must still rest on them; and that presumption, pride, and unbelief would still multiply inquiries and objections. (Notes, 2 Pet. 3:14–16.) Thus he gave no countenance, either to those who, with absurd arrogance, attempt to reduce all possible existence, truth, and knowledge, to the measure of their own intellect, and to believe no more than they can comprehend; or to those, who know no end of speculating, and of arguing from revealed truths to unrevealed causes and consequences, as they suppose them to be. Instead of this, he closed the subject, by breaking forth into admiration and adoration of the unfathomable depth, and infinite treasures, of the wisdom and knowledge of God. His views are immense and eternal; and his reasons, for every part of his vast designs, are taken from himself, and his purpose of glorifying his own perfections: (Marg. Ref. k.—Notes, Prov. 16:4. Eph. 1:3–8, 13, 14. 2:4–10. 3:9–12.) to us, therefore, they must be impenetrable and inexplicable, but they are all consistent with the riches, or infinite abundance, of his justice, truth, love, and mercy. His judgments and decrees, and his wisdom in them, cannot be fully investigated, or comprehended, by any created being; much less by us fallen creatures. His dealings with his creatures cannot be “traced out;” for they are an immense deep, where his footsteps cannot be known or traced. We should then be satisfied to understand, and receive by faith, the information which he graciously reveals: and to believe, that he acts with perfect wisdom, justice, truth, and goodness, when we cannot comprehend what he is doing; or when his dispensations seem to us, not reconcilable to these his essential perfections. This must be the duty of created intelligences: for what being has an intuitive acquaintance with the mind of the great Creator, that he should be able to discover his unrevealed designs? Or, who can say, that he has counselled the most High, and therefore understands his intentions, and can unravel his decrees? Or who has first given any thing to the Lord? or rendered him any service, previous to his having received so much from him, as to be bound by the strongest obligations to devote his all to him? If any can prove, that the Lord is thus indebted to him, he shall certainly be recompensed: but all such claims, and all men’s disputations against his decrees, dispensations, truths, and precepts, involve in them the most irrational arrogance, nay, the most horrible blasphemy. (Marg. Ref. m, n.—Notes, Job 41:1–11, v. 11. Is. 40:12–17. Jer. 23:18. Dan. 4:34–37. 1 Cor. 2:14–16.) For of Him, as the self-existent, all-sufficient, and eternal Fountain of being and perfection, all creatures were originally derived: by and through Him they all subsist, are provided for, and disposed of; and to Him they all are, or ought to be, wholly devoted; and in one way or other, they all shall proclaim, or display, the glory of his perfections, and the honor of his great name. (Marg. Ref. o, p.—Notes, Col. 1:15–17. Heb. 1:3, 4.) Instead therefore of murmuring and objecting, all men should, and all believers will, most cordially say, “To Him be glory forever. Amen.”

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1–10.

God never “casts away those, whom he hath foreknown,” and “predestinated to be conformed to the image of his Son;” and if this seal of conformity to Christ be affixed to our souls, we may be assured of his everlasting favor, and all the felicity which springs from it. (Notes, 2 Cor. 1:21, 22. Eph. 1:13, 14.) We may also cheerfully hope, that he “has reserved for himself” a far larger proportion of believers in the worst of times, than fall under our cognizance, or comport with any of our computations: and, instead of “making intercession against” the multitudes of worthless professors of Christianity, with whom we are on all sides surrounded; we should still hope and pray, that “a remnant according to the election of grace,” may yet be gathered even from among them. For, as our salvation originated wholly from the grace of God, so we may expect to see that grace abound in the conversion of the chief of sinners, of every description. But, while the whole glory of salvation must be given to the grace of God, sinners perish for their own wickedness: (Notes, Jam. 1:13–18.) and those who seek his favor in unauthorized ways, will never obtain it. Numbers are thus left to be “blinded,” and given up to “the spirit of slumber,” and to presumptuous confidence; till all their advantages are so misused, that they help to ensnare and harden them, and bind them fast in the bondage of Satan: and it is only by the mercy of God, that any of us are preserved from these various strong delusions, which might justly have been awarded us, as the recompense of our pride and ungodliness.

V. 11–15.

The Lord over-rules the fall and ruin of some, to the salvation of others. His awful judgments, on daring transgressors, frequently warn their companions or neighbors to “flee from the wrath to come:” and on the other hand, the conversion of notorious sinners sometimes excites others to inquire after Christ and salvation. But what extensive, permanent, and most glorious effects may be produced, in the whole creation of God, through eternal ages, by the fall of angels and men, by redemption in Christ, and by the dispensations of God towards the church and the world, who can tell? However, a hint of this, a glimpse as it were of the invisible world, should remind us, that the Lord may have ten thousand wise and gracious reasons, for his most severe and terrible judgments, of which we can form no conception. Thus the fall of the Jews was the occasion of the Gentiles being enriched, with the unsearchable treasures of Christ; and his justice, truth, and wisdom were glorified in that awful dispensation; yet their eyes were so blinded, that they could see no glory in it.—We, the ministers of the gospel, however mean and unworthy in ourselves, should “magnify our office,” as conducting unspeakably more to enrich and bless mankind, (provided it be faithfully executed,) than all arts, sciences, commerce, or improvements whatever, unitedly ever have done, or can do. While we labor for the conversion of those, among whom we are called to minister, we should have respect also to others, and even to those who are most prejudiced against us; if by any means we can “excite them to emulation,” or do any thing “to save some of them;” for they too are “our own flesh.” The Lord over-rules his works of judgment, to the reconciling of sinners to himself, for he “delighteth in mercy;” and he will ere long display his glorious power, by making the salvation of one people the introduction to that of others, especially in the restoration of Israel; till “life from the dead” shall be communicated to all the nations of the earth.

While we wait and pray for the approaching happy times to the church; let us be thankful for our engrafting, as “branches of the wild olive-tree,” into the holy tree “the church of the living God;” to “partake of the root and fatness of it;” that “the blessing of Abraham might come on us Gentiles, by faith.” (Notes, Gal. 3:10—14. Heb. 12:22—25.) But let the state of those, who were “the natural branches” of this tree, warn us not to rest in external profession or external advantages: and not to boast and glory against others, or to prefer ourselves, or indulge carnal security. (Notes, 1 Cor. 10:1—12. Jude 5—8.) If we stand at all, it is “by faith;” this implies that we are guilty, polluted, and helpless in ourselves; and warns us to be humble, watchful, and afraid of self-deception, or of being overcome by temptation. Let us also observe, that we are not only at first “justified by faith;” (Note, 5:1,2.) but preserved to the end in that justified state by faith only; yet, by a faith which is not alone but which is attended by humble repentance, and “worketh by love” of God and man.—Alas! how has the once flourishing church of Rome fallen, by neglecting the apostle’s caution! And how many other churches, and what an immense number of individuals, have, in a measure, trodden the same path! But blessed are those “who fear always;” and “walk humbly with God;” who contemplate, with holy awe and fervent gratitude, “the severity and the goodness” of the Lord, as revealed in his word, and displayed in his providence; who are thus led to be “sober, and to watch unto prayer;” who by living faith, “continue in his goodness;”

and wait for its complete effect in their eternal salvation. But if any presume that they are “the peculiar people of God,” and despise others, they will at length be cut off, and cast as unfruitful branches into the fire; while such as have been most estranged from the truth, will find admission to all the privileges of the gospel, if they abide not in unbelief.

V. 25—36.

As pride is the genuine offspring of ignorance, so an enlarged spiritual knowledge of the mysterious truths and dispensations of God, tends to prevent our being “wise in our own conceits.” His dealings with his creatures appear very different, when viewed in detached parts, from what they will do, when seen as constituting a most glorious whole.—Zion’s great Deliverer saves none from wrath, but those who are separated “from ungodliness;” for his covenant with his people ensures their sanctification, as well as their justification. His “gifts and calling are without repentance,” in respect of his true church: this he has shadowed forth in his dealings with Israel as a nation. Their captivities, dispersions, and exclusion from the church, are emblems of the believer’s corrections and rebukes for his transgressions: and the continued favor of the Lord towards that people, and the final mercy, and most blessed restoration, shortly intended for them, denote the persevering patience and victorious love of God, to those whom he has “chosen in Christ before the foundation of the world,” and will finally save for his sake. As we therefore have obtained mercy, through the unbelief of the Jews; let us pray, and use all proper means as we can, that through our mercy they may speedily obtain mercy. Instead of perplexing our minds about secret things, let us walk in the light which the Lord has graciously afforded us: and, conscious of our inability to comprehend his deep designs, let us adore the depth of the riches of his wisdom and knowledge, whose judgments are not to be investigated, nor his ways traced out; whose mind none can penetrate or comprehend; who needs and regards no counsellor: who first gives life and breath and all things to every one; and to whom none can render any thing, which he has not first received from him. “For of him, and through him, and to him are all things, to whom be glory for ever. Amen.” (Notes, 1 Chr. 29:1—19. Dan. 4:28—37. 5:18—24.)

CHAP. XII.

The apostle exhorts Christians, “by the mercies of God,” to devote themselves to him; and avoiding conformity to the world, to be conformed to his holy will, 1,2; to think humbly and soberly of themselves, as members of one body in Christ, 3—5; to exercise faithfully their different gifts, and perform the duties of their several stations, for the common benefit, 6—8; to mutual love, diligence, patience, hope, prayer, hospitality, compassion, and condescension, 9—16; to a peaceable, forgiving, and becoming conduct towards all men; and to a persevering kindness to enemies; as vengeance belongeth unto God, 17—21.

Note.—The apostle, having closed the doctrinal and argumentative part of his epistle, (which is throughout so carefully guarded, as to be of a very practical tendency,) proceeds here to enforce more particularly a variety of important duties from evangelical principles. He intreated, or exhorted, the Romans, as his brethren in Christ, most earnestly and affectionately, “by the mercies of God” shown to them, in their election, redemption, conversion, and their most abundant privileges; that they would evidence “the sincerity of their love,” and honor the gospel, by “presenting their bodies as a living sacrifice unto” him. The allusion seems to be made to the living animals, which were “presented” as sacrifices before the altar, that they might be slain, and thus offered to God upon it. Thus Christians should “present their bodies” before God, to be employed in his service, and to be spent and worn out by hardships or labors for him; that so they might be wholly devoted to his glory. The body with its members, senses, and organs, is the instrument of the carnal mind, in executing its purposes, and gratifying its evil inclinations: when therefore the mind is made spiritual, the body should, in like manner, execute its holy purposes and express its spiritual affections. (Marg. Ref. a—c.—Notes, 6:12—19.) Thus the soul becomes the consecrated priest, and the body “the living sacrifice unto God through Jesus Christ.” (Marg. Ref. d.—Notes, Phil. 4:14—20. Heb. 13:15,16. 1 Pet. 2:4—6. Rev. 1:4—6.) In general, this sacrifice must be presented alive, to be employed in the worship and work of God; though sometimes at length the body must also be offered up to death by martyrdom. (Notes, 14:7—9. Phil. 1:19,20.) As the legal sacrifices (which that of Christ has now superseded,) were required to be “without spot or blemish;” so the bodies of believers must be separated from the practice of all iniquity, or they cannot be meet to be “living sacrifices to God;” but, being sanctified by the Holy Spirit, the worship and obedience performed by them, as the instruments of the renewed soul, are far more pleasing and honorable to God, than legal sacrifices in themselves could be. This is “a reasonable service” and worship, suited to rational creatures, and to their relations and obligations to God, as redeemed sinners: whereas the oblation of bulls and goats, though appointed by the Lord, when separated from its typical meaning, was not, in itself, “a reasonable service:” how much less, then, can human inventions, and the observance of human traditions, be a “reasonable service!” (Marg. Ref. e.)

2 And <sup>f</sup> be not conformed to this world: but <sup>g</sup> be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye may <sup>h</sup> prove what is that <sup>i</sup> good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God.

Note.—In thus wholly dedicating themselves to the service of God, Christians must go entirely against “the course of this world,” and incur the censure, ridicule, or enmity of ungodly men, which will often greatly interfere with their worldly interests. (Note, Eph. 2:1, 2.) They ought not therefore to seek happiness from the world; or conform to the maxims, customs, and fashions of mankind in general. They must not comply with common usages, as to their pursuits or employments, in any respect; where such usages are contrary to the holy commands of God, the spirit of the gospel, the interests of piety, the prosperity of their own souls, and the improvement of their talents. In all these things the reproach of singularity is honorable, the want of it suspicious; and to be fashionable is to be unchristian.—A serious regard to this, and a few other maxims of a similar nature, would soon show men, in what things they must “not be conformed to this world:” and would convince them that, on the one hand affected singularity, in things minute or indifferent, comes far short of the spirituality of the exhortation; and on the other hand, that they excuse their vain amusements, splendid decorations, expensive feastings, eager pursuits of wealth, power, or distinction, waste of time, and other parts of their conduct; because they love the friendship of the world, “savor earthly things,” and cannot endure self-denial, or the cross; not because they can fairly prove that the maxims and customs of the world, in these respects, are so agreeable to the spirit of the gospel, that they may safely conform to them. (Marg. Ref. f.—Notes, 8:5—9. Ps. 1:1—3. Prov. 9:1—6. Matt. 16:24—28. 1 Cor. 10:29—33. 2 Cor. 6:14—18. Eph. 5:8—20. Phil. 3:17—19. Col. 3:16,17. Jam. 4:4—6. 1 John 2:15—17.) In order to escape these and other snares, the apostle called on the Christians at Rome, “to be transformed by the renewing of their mind.” (Marg. Ref. g.—Notes, Eph. 4:20—24. Col. 3:7—11.) This “transformation” of the soul into the holy image of Christ; this daily renovation of the understanding, judgment, and affections by the power of the Holy Spirit, is the only effectual cure of “conformity to this world;” because it produces conformity to “the spirits of just men made perfect;” and a capacity for delighting in such society and employments, as most resemble the inhabitants, worship, and joys of heaven. Animated, urgent, and affectionate exhortations to seek this inward transformation, as essential to duty and happiness, are the appointed and proper means of leading Christians to plead the promises, and attend on the ordinances of God, in order to attain unto it more and more. Thus they “prove,” or make trial of, and experience, the happiness to be found in obeying the salutary, excellent, and holy “will of God,” made known in his spiritual law, and now enforced by the blessed gospel: they manifest their cordial approbation of it, and show to others its excellency and beneficial tendency. (Notes, 7:9—14.) This alone can be “an acceptable service” to God, being perfect in its own nature, and suited to the perfecting of the soul in holiness; and then the body will indeed be “presented as a living sacrifice unto him.” (Marg. Ref. h, i, --Note, 1.)—There does not appear in these verses any distinction intended between the Jewish and Gentile converts; or any reason to conclude, as some have done, that the Gentiles were especially addressed. The customs and practices of the unbelieving Jews were as little to be conformed to by Christians, as those of the heathen were; and the case is exactly the same in respect of a vast majority, in countries called Christian.—The Jews were no longer required to offer the legal sacrifices, the Gentiles must renounce their idolatrous sacrifices; and were not required to keep the ritual law; but both were bound to devote themselves to God in holy obedience.

3 For <sup>k</sup> I say, through the grace given unto me, to every man that is among you, <sup>l</sup> not to think of himself more highly than he ought to think; but to think * soberly, <sup>m</sup> according as God hath dealt to every man the measure of faith.

4 For <sup>n</sup> as we have many members in one body, and all members have not the same office;

5 So <sup>o</sup> we, being many, are one body in Christ, and every one members one of another.

Note.—The preceding general exhortation was in the affectionate style of brotherly love, but this is in that of apostolical authority. According to the distinguishing favor shown to him, in his call to be “the apostle of the Gentiles,” St. Paul charged the Romans to beware of spiritual pride, to which their distinguished situation might peculiarly expose them. (11: 20,25.) Let no one of them, however eminent for rank, abilities, learning, or endowments of any kind, “think more highly of himself,” than consisted with the truth of his case and character, as a sinner saved by grace alone. Let none forget the Giver of his peculiar distinctions, the end for which they were bestowed, and the improvement required of them. (Note, 1 Cor. 4:6,7.) Let none over-rate his own talents, as if they entitled him to superiority over others, or authorized his emulation and ambition. But let every one soberly and prudently estimate his own gifts and attainments, according as the Lord had dispensed to every man his “proportion of faith,” and the benefits connected with it: that he might neither bury his talent in the earth, as undervaluing it; nor yet grow proud of it, or above the duties of his proper station in the church; or aspire after those places for which he was not qualified; or envy and oppose such as filled them. (Marg. Ref. k—m.—Notes, 9—13, v. 10. Eph. 4:1—6. Phil. 2:1—8.) In short, every one of them ought to be in the church, as the members are in the human body: where each is fitted for its place, and, as it were, contented in it, and there quietly performs its proper function for the good of the whole. Thus united to Christ the Head, animated by one Spirit, and endued with different gifts, Christians are the members of one mystical body, and should seek the welfare of the whole body, in humble diligence, disinterested love, and unambitious quietness. (Marg. Ref. n, o.—Notes, 1 Cor. 12:12—31.)—Think more highly, &c. (3) ‘That he be not immoderately pleased with himself, as proud and ambitious persons are, who seem to themselves more wise than they really are. ... It behoves every one, ... to be conscious of those gifts, which he has received of the Lord, that he may perform his duty with a good conscience. But there are two boundaries, within which the sobriety and moderation, required by the apostle, are included. The one, that we arrogate nothing to ourselves, which we do not possess: the other, that we do not glory in what we have received, but use them, as gifts conferred on us, with trembling, to the glory of God.’ Beza. (Notes, Matt. 25:14—30. Luke 19:11—27.)—The measure of faith.] It is commonly said, that faith is here put for those spiritual gifts, which were conferred on believers, and exercised in proportion to the measure of their faith. Yet it is evident, that in some instances even miraculous powers were possessed by those, who had not saving faith. [Practical Observations.]

Note.—As God, the Giver of “every good and perfect gift,” had imparted to each Christian, abilities, providential advantages, spiritual gifts, miraculous powers, or qualifications for that office in the church, to which he had been called; and as none had any claim upon God for the least of these benefits, which he had an undoubted right to bestow, in that measure and proportion which he saw good, as an act of entire grace and favor; so every one ought to be satisfied in his place, and with his work, and ability to perform it. (Marg. Ref. p.—Note, 1 Pet. 4:9—11.) If any one, therefore, were endued with the gift of prophecy, and was enabled to foretell future events, to deliver any message from God, or to explain his word for the edification of the church; (Notes, 1 Cor. 12:4—11. 14:1—5, 20—25.) let him exercise this gift according to his ability, which would be in proportion to the degree of faith, by which he depended on the teaching of the Holy Spirit: or, (as some explain it,) let him show himself to be truly inspired, by speaking in entire consistency with “the analogy of faith,” or that system of divine truth, which God had made known to his church by his prophets and apostles. ‘Let no one rashly pour out what has not been revealed.’ Camero, in Leigh.—If a man were called to the office of a deacon, in receiving and dispensing the alms and oblations of believers, among the poor, the sick, the prisoners, or others; or in any other way to minister to the common benefit, by managing the concerns of the church; (Note, Acts 6:2—6.) let him faithfully, diligently, and steadfastly attend to that good work, and serve Christ and his brethren in it. If another were called to teach young persons, or new converts, the first principles of Christianity, or to instruct them in the truth and will of God; let him give himself up to the duties of that station, well satisfied with his work: and let him neither envy his superiors, nor despise those beneath him. If another were called to the higher functions of the pastoral office, by authoritatively counselling, encouraging, exhorting, admonishing, instructing, or reproving his fellow Christians; let him be chiefly concerned to fulfil his ministry in a proper manner, and to “give himself wholly to it,” as the great business and pleasure of his life. (P. O. Acts 6:1—7. Note, 1 Tim. 4:11—16.) He who, having this world’s goods, was enabled to serve the common cause, and to provide for his needy brethren; let him do it “liberally” without cov-etousness, and “in simplicity,” without ostentation, or assuming authority on that account; but with a single design of glorifying God by doing good to men. He also, who was called to exercise authority, either in the church over any description of its ministers, or in any magistracy or presidency in the community; let him deem himself advanced, not for his own honor, but for the good of others; and let him accordingly employ himself diligently in the performance of his proper duty. And finally, in whatever way any one might be called to exercise compassion, or to alleviate misery; let him do it with cheerfulness, notwithstanding the expense, hardship, danger, or disgusting circumstances, to which it might expose him; counting it his happiness by any means to be useful. (Marg. Ref. q—h.)—I am aware, that these verses are explained by many exclusively of the different orders of church-officers and rulers; and so every man endeavors to find his own system of ecclesiastical polity in them: but, though the various duties of the ministry in all its parts, are principally intended, there is no proof that the apostle meant them exclusively. He seems rather to have inculcated a general improvement of every man’s talents, for the common benefit of the church, whatever his gifts and place were. And as there were “saints in Cæsar’s household” soon after, it is not improbable that Christians might be called to the lower functions of the magistracy. (Notes, 16:21—23. Acts 13:6—12. Phil. 4:21, 22.) The epistle, however, was intended, by the Holy Spirit, for the edification of the church in all ages; and it may be supposed, that the duties of Christian magistrates, as well as those of church-rulers, are hinted at in the general language used by the apostle.—Some consider the word, rendered “ministry,” (7) to be a general term for the different orders of ministers in the church, which are afterwards enumerated: but the disjunctive particle or, seems unfavorable to that interpretation. The original word may point out the office of the primitive deacons; but the exhortation to “give with simplicity,” or liberality, appears more properly addressed to those, who distributed their own property, than to the deacons who were entrusted with the treasures of the church; and to whom, faithfulness, prudence, and impartiality, were especially necessary.—Gifts. (6) Many seem to think that spiritual, or miraculous, gifts are exclusively intended by this word: but this is evidently different from the general use of the word; and the office of a minister, of whatever order, is itself a distinct thing from a man’s qualifications for it. Other endowments were even at that time necessary to the due performance of the ministerial duties, even more so, than supernatural gifts; and the money, which some distributed, whether their own or the church’s, was a talent of entirely another nature; yet all were the free gifts of God, and as such to be received and improved.

Note.—The apostle next exhorted the Christians at Rome, to see to it, that their professed love of each other was sincere, and free from dissimulation and from that unmeaning and deceitful compliment, with which the world abounded, notwithstanding its selfishness.—This hollow show of affection, the counterfeit of genuine love, they ought by all means to avoid: and to be cordial, faithful, liberal, compassionate, forgiving, and kind in their whole temper and conduct. (Marg. Ref. c.—Notes, Jam. 2:14—18. 1 Pet. 1:22. 3:8—12. 1 John 3:18—24.) Depending on divine grace, they must also learn habitually to detest and dread all kinds of evil; and to love and delight in every thing good, kind, excellent, or useful; and to cleave constantly to it, whatever opposition or temptation they met with. By a holy kind of natural affection for their brethren in Christ, the effect of regeneration and progressive sanctification, they should delight in every exercise of mutual love. In deep humility, and a disposition to animadvert on their own faults, and to notice the gifts and graces of others, they ought to prefer and honor one another, yield that respect and precedence to others which ambitious men claim to themselves; and readily honor, and induce others to honor, the estimable conduct of their brethren, who, on one account or another, were disregarded or discouraged. (Marg. Ref. d—h.—Notes, 3—5. 1 Cor. 12:15—26. Phil. 2:1—4.) Whatever business any of them were called to, they ought to avoid slothfulness, and to do it in a skillful, diligent, and assiduous manner, from love to Christ, and zeal for the honor of the gospel, with ‘fervency of spirit, as serving the Lord’ in their most ordinary employments. (Marg. Ref. i—l.—Notes, Eph. 6:5—9. Col. 3:22—25.) This would ennoble every business, and render it acceptable to God; and it would rebound to the credit of the gospel, if every Christian acquitted himself better in the business which he undertook, than other men did.—They were also called on ‘to rejoice in hope’ of that glorious inheritance, which the promise of God ensured to them: and thus to bear up under their various trials, with submission, constancy, cheerfulness, and meekness. And as they could do none of these things of themselves; they ought to persist in constant earnest prayers, notwithstanding all the discouragements which they would feel, and the temptations with which they would meet, to render them slack in that duty. (Marg. Ref. m—o.—Notes, Eph. 6:18—20. Phil. 4:5—7. 1 Thes. 5:16—22.) Not only the wealthy, but all of them according to their ability, ought to distribute to the necessity of their poorer brethren; and hospitably to entertain in their houses such as were driven out by persecution, or came as strangers from other cities, or were in any way destitute; trusting in God to provide for the expense thus incurred.—Given to, &c. (13) ‘Stay not till occasions of this kind force themselves upon you; and much less till importunity extort the favor, as it were, against your will; but, like Abraham, look out for proper objects of such a bounty, and follow after them ‘to bring them back to your houses.’ Doddridge. (*Marg. [Practical Observations.]

Note.—With the kindness to friends and brethren above inculcated, Christians must harbor no resentment against their enemies; but pray for their persecutors and all men, in genuine good-will, and never utter bad wishes or imprecations against any one. (Marg. Ref. r.—Notes, Matt. 5:43—48. Luke 6:27—36. 1 Thes. 5:12—15. 1 Pet. 3:8—12.) Instead of grudging or envying the prosperity of their brethren or neighbors, they ought benevolently and unfeignedly to rejoice with them in it; as well as to sympathize with those who mourned, and endeavor to relieve and comfort them. (Marg. Ref. s, t.—Note, 1 Cor. 13:4—7.) Thus they all ought to be united in one mind and affection, and to judge themselves interested in the welfare of every individual of the body, to which they were joined. (Notes, 3—5. 1 Cor. 12:15—26.) Nor ought they to covet, value, or aspire to high things, such as wealth, honorable connexions, preferments, reputation; but be satisfied to associate with men of low estate, or to stoop to mean and low accommodations; being contentedly poor, or condescendingly and benevolently rich. (Marg. Ref. u—y.) Especially, they should avoid all conceit of their own wisdom, as if they were above ordinary rules, had no occasion to ask wisdom of God, or to regard the counsel of their brethren; or as if they ought to be at the head of every business, and nothing could be well done if they were not consulted or employed about it. (Marg. Ref. z.)—Condescend, &c. (16) Conversing affably, and readily associating with poor Christians; those especially, who are lowly in mind as well as circumstances.

17 a Recompense to no man evil for evil. b Provide things honest in the sight of all men.

18 If c it be possible, as much as lieth in you, live peaceably with all men.

19 Dearly beloved, d avenge not yourselves, but rather e give place unto wrath: for it is written, f Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord.

20 Therefore s if thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink: for in so doing thou shalt heap h coals of fire on his head.

21 Be i not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good.

Note.—The preceding exhortations had principally respected the behavior of Christians one toward another; but these relate to their conduct among their unconverted neighbors. No provocation ought ever to induce any of them to “render evil for evil to any man,” however base his character were; whether he were a Jew, Gentile, Greek, barbarian, heretic, or schismatic. In every part of their conduct, and in all their dealings, they ought to devise and endeavor, that uprightness, punctuality, sincerity, and fidelity, might evidently appear in them, in the sight of their most severe judges. (Marg. Ref. a, b.—Notes, 2 Cor. 8:16—24. 1 Thes. 5:12—22.) By the most harmless and forbearing conduct, and by every sacrifice and concession, they ought, “if possible,” to avoid all quarrels and litigations, and to live at peace among their most unreasonable and injurious neighbors: avoiding all contention, as the greatest evil to their own souls, and to the cause of true religion; except it were a meek, but steadfast, contention for the truth. (Marg. Ref. c.—Notes, Eph. 4:1—6. Col. 3:12—15. Heb. 12:14. Jam. 3:17, 18. Jude 3, 4.)—When they were insulted, defrauded, or assaulted, even if no redress could be obtained from the magistrate, they must not on any account presume to avenge themselves; but rather give way to the wrath of their enemies, and without opposition endure the effects of it: or, as some interpret it, they should “give place,” and leave it to God, whose wrath they had incurred, to punish them, if he saw good; as private persons must “give place,” and leave the punishment of those who had robbed or assaulted them, to the magistrate. (Marg. Ref. d, e.—Notes, Matt. 5:38—42. Luke 6:27—36. 9:51—56. 22:47—53. 1 Pet. 2:18—25.) For God had declared that “vengeance belonged to him:”

when therefore an unauthorized person presumed to avenge himself, he invaded God's prerogative, and, as it were, attempted to wrest his sword of justice out of his hand. (Marg. Ref. f.—Notes, 13:3—5. Num. 31:2. Deut. 32:34,35. Ps. 94:1—7. Prov. 24:17,18,29. Nah. 1:2—6. Luke 18:1—8. 2 Thes. 1:5—10. Heb. 10:28—31. Rev. 6:9—11. 16:3—7. 18:20.)—on the contrary, they ought to wait for the opportunity of their enemy being in distress, in order kindly to supply his wants, and alleviate his sufferings; as a man would feed and give drink to a weary, wounded, fainting traveller. In doing this, they would use the proper method for melting down his obdurate heart into reciprocal affection; like the founder, who not only puts fire under the hard piece of metal, but heaps fire over it also, that by fire on every side it may at length be melted. (Marg. Ref. g, h.—Note, Prov. 25:21,22.) In this contest of love against hatred, they should persevere with a fixed determination not to yield, or to be overcome by any degree or number of injuries, or by any ingratitude or ill usage; so as to give way to resentment, or to cease from embracing the opportunity of returning kindness: but with a holy pertinacity to persist in the purpose of “overcoming evil with good,” after the example of the Lord towards them. ‘He is overcome of evil, who sinned in his conduct to another, because the other sinned in his conduct towards him.’—Heap coals, &c. (20) ‘I believe the sense is ‘rather this, that if he persevere in his enmity, ‘... after these kind offices, thou by thy patience shalt engage the wrath of God to fall upon him, and to maintain thy cause against him. ‘... So Prov. 20:22. “Say not thou, I will recompense evil; but wait on the Lord, and he shall save thee.”—This is the import of the phrase in the Old Testament, where only it occurs. (Ps. 140:9,10. ... Is. 47:14. ... Ez. 10:2. 2 Esdras 16:52.)’ Whitby.—Those commentators, who argue that this cannot be the meaning, for that would be ‘applying to revenge, and building upon it,’ while it is expressly forbidden, seem not to have duly adverted to some other parts even of the New Testament. (Luke 18:7,8. 2 Thes. 1:5—9. Rev. 6:9,10. 16:5—7. 18:20.) To expect that God will avenge himself on those who injure us out of hatred to him, and are not won over by any kindness shown to them, is very different from “avenging ourselves:” and it is evident, from the texts referred to, that in some cases to desire, that God would deliver his servants, by taking vengeance on their persecutors, or to rejoice when this is done, is not an unholty passion. At the same time it is asserting far too much to say, that in all cases (or in any case, without the special grace of God,) our kindness will melt down our obdurate enemies. On the other hand, Dr. Whitby too readily takes it for granted, that in the passage in Proverbs, which the apostle quotes, “coals of fire” mean the vengeance of God; and one text at least he has overlooked, in which that expression is used of the intense fervor and great strength of love, (Note, Cant. 8:6,7.) while he appears to have misunderstood another. (Note, Prov. 20:22.)—Upon the whole, it appears to me, that both interpretations may stand. The line of our duty is clearly marked out; and if our enemies are not melted down by persevering kindness, they will be consumed by the fiery wrath of “that God to whom vengeance belongeth.” This does not, however, at all deduct from the loving and spiritual import of the exhortation; which being found in the Old Testament, and not exceeded even in the New, is a full refutation of the opinion held by very many, that a more spiritual rule of duty is established under the gospel, than had before existed. ## PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

Surely they strangely misunderstand the doctrines which the apostle teaches, who suppose them inconsistent with exhortations, and instruction in all the several duties of Christianity; or as inimical to the practice of them! The same inspired writer, who most fully establishes, and most earnestly argues for, the doctrines of grace, is also most exact and particular in exhorting Christians to their various duties. Those who seem afraid that his doctrine may tend to licentiousness, will be equally averse to the impracticable strictness of his precepts: and many, who profess to be zealous friends to the former, are apt to find fault with the latter as legal, when echoed by the faithful preachers of the gospel. But the mercies of God, apprehended by faith, and experienced in the heart, and exciting by divine grace reciprocal love and gratitude, form the grand motive to all willing obedience. (Notes, Luke 7:40—50. 2 Cor. 5:13—15. 1 John 4:19.) The love of Christ, abounding in our souls, will cause us earnestly to desire, that our bodies also (the work of his creating power, and the purchase of his redeeming blood,) should be “presented to him as a living sacrifice:” that he may be magnified in and by them, whether by the actions and sufferings of a devoted holy life, or by “laying down our lives for his sake;” which is in every respect our “reasonable service.” (Notes, Phil. 1:19—26.) May we then, with a willing mind, bring our bodies to be washed, and consecrated to the Lord, as instruments of righteousness unto him!—The transformation of the soul, by “the renewing of the Holy Ghost,” produces so holy a judgment and taste, and such heavenly affections, that it will readily show us in what respects we must avoid conformity to the world; and it will lead us to an equal distance from useless singularities, and from timid, carnal, and dishonorable compliances. But, if the world possess a large share in the heart, some excuse will be invented for indulging the favorite inclination.—Experience will convince us, and this alone can do it effectually, how good and pleasant “the acceptable and perfect will of the Lord is:” so that the more we refuse conformity to a vain and wicked world, that we may walk with God in his holy ways; the more indifferent we shall grow to the former, and the greater delight we shall take in the latter.—Every avenue of the soul should be guarded against pride: and repeated warnings on this subject are needful to all men, especially to those who are in any respect conspicuous. (Notes, 2 Cor. 12:7—10. P. O. 1—10.) If indeed we soberly estimated our endowments, and compared them with our deserts; if we duly considered from whom, and for what, we have received them, and how far we have come short of a proper improvement of them; they would all conduce to our humiliation, as well as the increase of our gratitude: and thus we might know and improve our talents, and yet be covered with shame for not having better improved them. But we are apt to shine in our own eyes, and “to think of ourselves more highly than we ought to think:” and this leads us to neglect the glory of God, and our duty as “members of the Body of Christ;” and to indulge emulation, ambition, contests for precedence, contempt of others, and discontent with our own proper place and service. Let us then watch and pray against these pernicious evils; and, whatever our gifts or situation may be, let us endeavor to occupy with our talent, humbly, diligently, cheerfully, and in simplicity; not seeking our own credit or profit, but the good of many, both temporal and eternal.

V. 9—16.

It is our duty, and should be our constant endeavor, from “undissembled love,” to exceed in evident benevolence, kindness, and courteousness, all those appearances, which polite selfishness assumes; and to be really as ready to oblige and be serviceable, as polite worldly people profess to be. Thus, “abhorring all evil,” “cleaving to all good,” and delighting in every exercise of brotherly love; being in our element, when contributing to the comfort of others; and habitually ready “in honor to prefer others to ourselves;” we shall “adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour,” and it will appear amiable in the eyes of those with whom we live.—While religion cuts the sinews of that selfish activity, which keeps the world in motion, it supplies its place by still more efficacious principles. (Note, Gal. 2:17—21.) Love to God and man, with zeal for the honor of the gospel, will influence the intelligent Christian to be diligent in his worldly business, and in acquiring superior skill, that in it he may “serve the Lord” with “fervency of spirit.” The joyful hope, also, of heavenly felicity will better support him, in his labors and trials, and endure his soul with more patient constancy, than the expectation of worldly riches or distinctions can do their deluded votaries: while, by “instant continuance in prayer,” he will find his hope confirmed, and his alacrity in duty revived from time to time. Thus cheerfully dispensing of his gains or earnings, to the necessities of his brethren; “using hospitality without grudging;” blessing and wishing well even to his most injurious and malicious enemies; and feeling no ill-will against any man, but good-will to all; sharing the joy of the prosperous, and sympathizing with the sorrowful; being of one mind and heart with all the children of his heavenly Father; not aspiring to high things in this world, but condescending (if sinful worms can be said to condescend) “to men of low estate,” and not thinking any honest employment beneath him, or any provision too mean for him; he may pass safely, comfortably, and usefully through life, and be habitually prepared for a better world.

V. 17—21.

Regard to the honor of the gospel, and love to mankind, will dispose the zealous Christian, as far as he can, to “provide things honest,” becoming, and creditable in the sight of others; to “live peaceably if possible with all men;” to bear injuries, without retaliation or eager resistance, committing his cause to “God to whom vengeance belongeth;” to pity and relieve the miseries of his persecutors or enemies, and to endeavor, by persevering kindness, to convert them into friends: as the love of Christ and his own experience cannot fail to supply motives for persisting in this only contest, and render him ambitious of the most honorable of all victories, even that of “overcoming evil with good.”—And what now is this, but a few particulars of the holy law of love, expounded, and enforced by evangelical principles? Yet, if our eternal state were to be determined, even as to the most conscientious part of our lives, according to the obedience which we have paid to them, or our failure in them; even Sinai’s fire and thunder would not be so tremendous as such a judgment. But if, as redeemed sinners, justified in Christ Jesus, we are called to obey these beautiful precepts by his grace and for the honor of his name, while his blood still cleanses away our daily stains; we then see them to be kind monitors to show us, in what manner we may “prove the sincerity of our love,” enjoy the foretastes of heaven, be blessings to all around us, and grow meet for the employment and felicity of angels. And if all, who contend for the doctrines of grace, were thus “a peculiar people zealous of good works,” the gospel would appear in its genuine simple beauty, and all would be put to shame, who falsely accused our good conversation in Christ.

CHAP. XIII.

The apostle strongly inculcates subjection to rulers, the payment of tribute, and rendering to all their dues, 1—7. He exhorts to love of each other, as the fulfilment of the second table of the law, 8—10; and in the near prospect of complete salvation, to put away all the works of darkness, and seek in all things to be conformed to the Lord Jesus, 11—14.

Note.—Proceeding most earnestly and affectionately to exhort the Christians at Rome, “by the mercies of God;” (Note, 12:1.) the apostle next called on them “to be subject to the higher powers.” The Jews entertained various scruples, on the lawfulness of obeying heathen magistrates; (Note, Matt. 22:15–22.) and this gave occasion to turbulent spirits to excite scandalous and ruinous insurrections; and the same spirit might creep in among Christians, to the great disgrace of the gospel; as in later times, ecclesiastics, especially in the church of Rome, have claimed the most exorbitant exemptions in this particular. The apostle therefore used the most decisive language on this subject: “every soul,” or person, whether a Jewish or a Gentile convert, a private Christian or a minister, or however distinguished by miraculous gifts, or by his station in the church, or in any other way, was absolutely required to be subject to the laws and edicts of those, who held authority in the state; that is, in all things lawful. (Marg. Ref. a.) The “higher powers” at Rome were not only heathen, but usurping, oppressive, and even persecuting governors; and Nero, who was then emperor, was a monster of cruelty, caprice, and wickedness, almost unparalleled in the annals of mankind: yet no exception was made on that account. Christians were required to look above such concerns; and to consider God as the Source of all authority, and civil government as his appointment for the benefit of mankind: the several forms of government, prevailing in different places, were to be regarded as the effect of his superintending providence; and the persons raised to authority as his deputies. (Marg. Ref. b.—Notes, Tit. 3:1,2. 1 Pet. 2:13–17.) It was, therefore, incumbent on all Christians to render a prompt and quiet obedience to those governors, under whom their lot was cast; patiently submitting to the hardships, and thankfully receiving the benefits, thence resulting; without objecting to the vices of the constitution, the administration, or the rulers, as an excuse for refusing subjection.—It is evident that the apostle did not mean to determine the divine right of absolute monarchy, or exclusively of any form of government; but to inculcate subjection to the ruling powers of every place and time, in which believers lived.—The benefits of civil government are very many and great; and it is the appointment of God, for maintaining order among the apostate and selfish race of men: so that any man, who should set himself to oppose the established government of that nation in which he lived, would be considered as resisting the providence and rebelling against the authority of God, who gave the rulers their authority, and will himself call them to account for the use which they make of it. (Marg. Ref. c—e.)—“All other governments derived their power from God, as well as that of the Jews; though they had not the whole frame of their government immediately from him, as the Jews had. ... Whether we take powers here, in the abstract, for political authority, or in the concrete, for the persons ac‘tually exercising political power and jurisdiction, the sense will be the same. ... How men come by a rightful title to this power, or who has this title, the apostle is wholly silent, and says nothing of it. To have meddled with that, would have been to decide of civil rights, contrary to the design and business of the gospel, and the example of our Saviour, who refused meddling in such cases, with this decisive question, “Who made me a judge or a divider over you?”’ Locke.—The words, rendered “the powers that be,” or “the existing authorities,” seem expressly intended to exclude all such inquiries. Whatever be the form of the existing government, or the way by which it was established; while it continues to exist, it must be regarded and submitted to, as the appointment of Providence. Perhaps nothing involves greater difficulties, in very many instances, than to ascertain, to whom, either individually, or collectively, the authority justly belongs; or, in fact, what constitutes a lawful title to authority. If then the most learned and intelligent men find insuperable difficulties, and differ widely in their opinions respecting this subject; how shall the bulk of the people be able to decide it? and if Christians are first to determine concerning the right, by which their rulers possess and exercise authority, before they think themselves bound to obedience; they must very commonly indeed be engaged in opposition to “the existing authorities.” But the apostle’s design was to mark out the plain path of duty to Christians, however circumstanced.—“The resistance, which consists in non-subjection, or a refusal to yield actual obedience to the law of the superior, can only be allowed, when the matter of the law is sinful, and so forbidden by the higher Power; not when it is judged inexpedient or improper only: for of this, subjects are not to judge, but the lawgiver only; in that they lawfully may, and therefore to avoid scandal and punishment, and from respect to him who is God’s vicegerent, ought to obey; even as servants ought to obey their froward masters, and children their parents, in all lawful things, (Col. 3:20. 1 Pet. 2:18.) ... and this from conscience towards God. ... No resistance of the higher powers by force, can be allowed to any who have not the power of the sword. ... For he that thus uses it, takes the sword without authority, from him “to whom belongeth vengeance;” ... and so without authority from Him to whom this power of the sword originally belongs. ... Where a people hath conferred not an absolute power, but a government according to the law, they must be supposed to have reserved to themselves a power necessary to preserve their laws.” Whitby.—Thus in mixed governments, there are legal and constitutional methods, by which the encroachments of one part of the government upon the rights of the others, may be resisted. But Christians, in private stations, have not much concern in this: and complicated cases may possibly arise, in which no previous rules or counsels can give adequate direction. Submission in all things lawful, to the “existing authorities,” is our duty at all times and in all cases; though in civil convulsions, and amid great revolutions, and sudden changes in governments; there may frequently, for a season, be a difficulty in determining which are to be considered as the "existing authorities."—To claim the protection of the law, against the illegal violence even of magistrates, is not "resisting the powers that be." (Notes, Acts 16:35—40. 22:22—30. 25:9—11.)—The word rendered damnation, properly signifies judgment: and is by many expositors explained exclusively of the punishment inflicted by the magistrate: but the apostle is speaking of our duty to God, in obeying magistrates; which if we neglect, he will call us to account for it, and finally condemn us, except we repent.—Some have urged, against the interpretation here given, that if this be indeed the rule of our religion, it lies open to the charge of abetting tyranny, and being inimical to civil liberty. But I apprehend, that this is not the case: for all the crimes committed by usurpers, tyrants, and oppressors, are at least as severely condemned in scripture, as those committed by rebels and traitors. Now a religion cannot justly be regarded as abetting tyranny, or as inimical to civil liberty, which denounces the severest vengeance of God on those who act tyrannically, and unjustly deprive men of liberty. The apostle was not writing a treatise on politics; but teaching a company of private Christians their duty. Had he been called on by Nero, or any other oppressive ruler, as he was by Felix, he would doubtless have "reasoned with him on righteousness, temperance, and a judgment to come:" (Note, Acts 24:24—27.) and had he been sent immediately by God to rulers, as the ancient prophets were; he would doubtless have plainly told them their duty, and protested against particular instances of their tyranny and oppression, in the "spirit and power of Elijah," and of John the Baptist, when he said to Herod concerning Herodias, "It is not lawful for thee to have her." (Notes, 1 Kings 21:17—25. Matt. 14:3—5.) But it should be very seriously considered, on the other hand, whether the charge of being seditious, and "hurtful to kings and provinces," has not in every age been brought against the zealous worshippers of God? (Notes, Ezra 4:12—24. Luke 23:1—5. Acts 16:19—24. 17:5—9.) whether this has not been, and is not at this day, the main pretext of persecutors; and of those who would exclude the preachers of the gospel out of their several districts? and whether the necessity, which is laid on Christians "to obey God rather than man," is not in many cases likely enough to exasperate the spirit of haughty princes, without openly avowing, that there are other cases, in which we are not bound to obey them?—cases, which in fact call their right to authority in question, and directly impeach their wisdom and justice. Surely this is suited to increase that jealousy against the ministers, missionaries, and professors of the gospel, in the minds of rulers, in all parts of the world, which to this day forms one grand barrier to the propagation of Christianity; a barrier, insurmountable except by the power of God. Had the primitive Christians explained the apostle's doctrine, with so many exceptions, and limitations, and cautions, as numbers do at present, and acted accordingly; and had

Christianity assumed that political aspect, which it has generally borne in latter ages, (arising from the circumstances of the times;) nothing but a constant succession of miracles could have prevented its extirpation, by the rage of its numerous persecutors. But, in this respect, the apostles, and primitive ministers and Christians, and their successors for some ages, when situated "as lambs amidst wolves," were indeed "wise as serpents and harmless as doves." Yet they did not escape the charge of being seditious: but where do we read of an accusation brought against them as abettors of tyranny and enemies of liberty?

3 For <sup>f</sup>rulers are not a terror to good works, but to the evil. <sup>g</sup>Wilt thou then not be afraid of the power? do that which is good, and thou shalt have praise of the same:

4 For <sup>h</sup>he is the minister of God to thee for good. But if thou do that which is evil, <sup>i</sup>he is afraid; for he beareth not the sword in vain: for he is the minister of God, <sup>k</sup>a revenger to execute wrath upon him that doeth evil.

5 Wherefore <sup>l</sup>ye must needs be subject, not only for wrath, but also for <sup>m</sup>conscience' sake.

Note.—In this way God preserves the good, and restrains the bad: by this sentence, the magistrates themselves are admonished of their duties to their subjects. Beza.—In the general course of human affairs, rulers are not a terror to honest, quiet, and good subjects, but to depredators and malefactors: and, on the whole, the benefits of government, even when in many instances it is oppressive, far more than counterbalance its evils, and the worst regular government existing on earth is immensely preferable to anarchy. Those therefore, who would be free from terror in this respect, should lead honest and inoffensive lives; and then they will in ordinary cases be countenanced, protected, and even commended, by their rulers; and may look on them as the ministers of Providence for their good, in defending their persons, property, and habitations, from the violence of wicked men. On the other hand, the evil-doer ought to be afraid; for the magistrate does not "bear the sword" of justice "in vain;" but as the minister of God's providential government of the world, as "a revenger" by his authority to punish those who violate the peace of the community: (Note, 12:17—21.) so that it is absolutely necessary for men to submit to the authority of the magistrate; not only from fear of his wrath, but also "from conscience' sake" towards God. (Marg. Ref.) If the ruler abuse his authority, God will call him to an account for it; there are in many countries legal and constitutional checks upon those, who attempt to introduce tyranny; and on great occasions, the people will sometimes, with one consent, arise against a cruel oppressor, and subvert his government; as the Romans did against Nero, who was condemned by the senate to die, as an enemy to mankind, with the approbation of the whole world. But Christians are seldom called on to take any active or leading part in such transactions. If laws be unreasonably formed, or iniquitously executed; this should be endured as a cross laid on them, till they, who are legally authorized, apply a remedy to the evil; or nothing more be attempted than by peaceable and respectful petitions. And if we be required by human authority to sin against God, we must steadfastly refuse obedience, and cheerfully and meekly endure the consequence, well satisfied with the blessings ensured by the promise of God, to those "who suffer for righteousness' sake." 6 For, for this cause "pay ye tribute also: for they are God's ministers ° attending continually upon this very thing.

Note.—For similar reasons it is the duty of Christians to pay taxes also: because as the advantages of government are great, so must its expenses be very large. Rulers are "the ministers of God," in providence, who are called "to attend constantly to this very thing." It is proper, and for the good of the people, that they, their families, and attendants, should appear in dignity and splendor: they are, and ought to be, taken from the highest ranks in the community; as the temptations of such exalted stations must in general be irresistibly strong, to those who have been educated in comparative indigence. (Notes, Prov. 28:3. 30:21—23. Ec. 10:5—7, 16—19.)—Both governors and governed are fallen creatures; and therefore selfishness can by no method whatever be excluded. Some excess of expenditure some improper accumulation of treasure, some waste of it, in providing for relatives and dependents, may be expected, though not justified.—Taxes must therefore be imposed, and ought to be scrupulously paid. (Marg. Ref. n.) Sometimes they will be oppressive, or very heavy; but this grievance should be patiently endured, till it be constitutionally redressed. So that it is the will of God, that his worshippers and servants render to rulers, the tribute, custom, excise, or impost, demanded legally from them, with as much exactness, as they would pay any other debt. (Note, Matt. 22:15—22.) They must use no collusion or fraud; they should not hesitate or murmur: and all smuggling, or dealing in contraband goods; all withholding or evading duties imposed on any commodity; and every species of this kind of imposition, is a direct rebellion against the providence and most express commandment of God. And, however it may be palliated or varnished over; it is not merely a defalcation of the revenue, but likewise a robbery of all who pay taxes. For such collusions will not prevent the sum required from being raised upon the public: so that, when one tax falls short another is imposed; and when he, who should pay five pounds, pays but three, his more conscientious neighbor must pay seven instead of five, and is therefore directly robbed of forty shillings. At the same time, all the atrocious crimes of the whole body of smugglers, and others who combine to defraud the revenue in a great variety of ways, are abetted by every one, who puts his hand to such a dishonest business. (Note, Ex. 20:15.) In this case, to declaim about the vices and extravagances of rulers, is to add one sin to another; (Notes, 2 Pet. 2:10, 11. Jude 5—10.) these things never were worse than in the days of Nero; they are inseparable from human nature; the great Lawgiver was aware of them, when he gave the commandment; and if no man paid a tax, till the character and administration of all concerned in managing public business, and the disposal of the public money, and the tax itself, met his full approbation; none would ever be paid, by the selfish and unreasonable part of the community, and the public exigences could never be answered. This subject is the more enlarged on, because the arguments and examples, of some avaricious professors of the gospel, draw in well meaning people to wound their consciences and disgrace the cause of religion, by evading or refusing taxes, in a disingenuous and fraudulent manner; which is as contrary to simple truth, as to common honesty. —Moreover, the apostle enjoins on Christians, to render "fear," or reverence and "honor," to those to whom they are due, on account of their authority, rank, or any other civil distinction; neither supposing, that religion requires a stiff and rude singularity, in refusing customary titles or expressions of honor and respect to superiors; (Note, Luke 1:1—4.) nor that it allows that petulance and scurrility, with which many delight to vilify the characters and conduct of their rulers, and those in high stations. Their faults should in general be regarded with candor and silence; (for their situation is conspicuous, and their temptations very great;) and, though the honor due to their rank and authority may consist with disapprobation of their conduct; yet not with reviling and defamation of them. The same authority which commands children to honor their parents, commands subjects to honor their rulers; and they should honor them in the same manner. (*Marg. 10 Love <sup>y</sup> worketh no ill to his neighbor: therefore <sup>z</sup> love is the fulfilling of the law.

Note.—It cannot be supposed that the apostle meant to prohibit the contracting of debts, on any account, which is next to impossible to the greatest part of mankind. Christians are indeed under the highest obligations to pay all legal demands, without reluctance or needless delay, and with great punctuality: and they should avoid all superfluous expense, and carefully guard against contracting any debts, which they have not a reasonable prospect of discharging. They ought also to stand aloof from all adventurous speculations, or rash engagements as sureties for others, beyond their circumstances; and whatever may needlessly involve them in debts, and expose them to the danger and discredit of not "rendering to all their dues." (Marg. Ref. s.—Notes, Ex. 20: 15. Prov. 6:1—5.) Yet, when all such demands are answered, and all these rules observed; they still "owe love" to all men, with the various duties which result from its enlarged exercise.—The learned Erasmus long since remarked, that the first clause might as properly and literally be rendered, "Ye do owe no man any thing, but to love one another:" and though subsequent commentators, almost without exception, take the words imperatively; yet it may be worthy of consideration, whether the indicative construction do not, far more simply and evidently, accord to the context. The apostle was exhorting Christians to render to all their dues; (7) and, having branched out the general precept into a few particulars; he closes, by adding, "Ye owe no man any thing, &c." as if he had said, 'All that I would inculcate is reducible to this; ObeY the law of love 'to others, in all its branches, and then you will 'render to all their dues.' (Notes, Ex. 20:12—17.) The sense in this construction is obvious and important; but the ordinary interpretation, seeming at least to forbid Christians to contract any debts; and to condemn such, as cannot at present discharge those already contracted, may embarrass the minds of the most upright; it requires considerable management in expounding it, so as to prevent this embarrassment: and after all, in the literal import, scarcely any so much as attempt to obey it; indeed to numbers it is, strictly speaking, impracticable. The usual exposition of the next clause, "but to love one another;" 'Be not a debtor to any man of 'ought, but love and affection, which ye ought 'so to pay, as that ye should have more to pay;' Bp. Hall; is not, to me at least, satisfactory; for why should we be allowed so to come short, in rendering "love to whom love is due;" as to be always there in arrears, and there only? If we daily rendered all that love to our neighbor, which is due to him, we should not remain in his debt. The next day would indeed require a fresh payment, but there would be no arrears due. Upon the whole, therefore, I cannot but decidedly prefer the indicative construction; "Ye do owe, &c." In short, the whole of what the apostle would inculcate was "love" in its various exercises and effects: so that he who loved another, "actually fulfilled the law," in respect of its requirements towards his neighbor; and this "love of our neighbor as ourselves," in obedience to the command of God, would also be the best evidence of our loving him with all our hearts, according to the first and great commandment of the law. (Marg. Ref. u, x.—Notes, Ex. 20:1—11. Lev. 19:18. Deut. 6:5. Matt. 19:16—22. Mark 12:28—34. Luke 10:25—37.)—The apostle, by thus appealing to the moral law as the standard of duty, after having so fully shown that no man can be justified by it, completely establishes the distinction between the law as a covenant, and the law as a rule; and proves that our deliverance from it in the former sense, is in order that we might obey it in the latter.—'Not that 'the law is exactly fulfilled by doing no evil to 'our neighbor: but, because, in Christ's interpretation, the neglect of doing any good we are 'able, and have opportunity to do for him, is 'doing evil. (Mark 3:4.) ... For "charity is 'also kind;" (1 Cor. 13:4.) and engageth us "by 'love to serve one another." (Gal. 5:13—15.)' Whitby. (Notes. 1:13—16. 1 Cor. 13:4—7. Gal. 6:1—5. 1 John 3:16,17.) Perfect love, with all its effects, fulfils the command of "loving our neighbor as ourselves:" but imperfect love, for a part of our lives, falls very short of this.

Note.—Some think that the apostle here refers to the approaching destruction of Jerusalem, and the more complete establishment of Christianity which followed; but the ruin of the Jewish nation could not much affect the Christians at Rome: and the situation of believers in this life, as expecting complete and eternal salvation, is evidently intended.—It behoved them to consider how long they had heard and professed the gospel; and the shortness of the time, that might yet remain to them, in which to glorify God among men. (Marg. Ref. a—c.—Notes, Ec. 9:10. Eph. 5:15—20.—P. O. John 9:1—12.) Thus they would perceive, that it was full time for them to shake off all remaining sloth and supineness, and to attend to every duty with increasing zeal and vigor: as the day of final salvation approached continually, and was then actually much nearer, than when they had first believed in Christ; and consequently their term of remaining usefulness on earth was proportionably abridged.—The redemption, by which salvation comes to sinners, was finished with the humiliation of the Saviour, and when he expired on the cross. (Note, John 19:28—30.) Salvation becomes ours, and is begun, when we come to him by faith: it will be finished as to the soul at the hour of death, and as to the body at the day of judgment; when sin and all its consequences will finally be abolished; and “death be swallowed up in victory.” (Notes, 1 Cor. 15:50—58.) The life of faith might be called “day,” in comparison of the darkness of the idolatrous and unconverted state: yet it was but “night,” or twilight, in comparison of the light of heaven. (Notes, 1 Cor. 13:8—12. Eph. 5:8—14. Col. 1:9—14, v. 12.) But this “night was far spent,” that “day was at hand:” it was therefore incumbent on them to prepare for it, and anticipate it, by casting off their former sins, in which they had lived during their heathen darkness: as a man would cast off filthy and ragged garments; or as he would put off his night-clothes, before he went out of his chamber. (Notes, Eph. 4:20—24. Col. 3:7—11. Jam. 1:19—21.

1 Pet. 2:1—3.) And they ought to put on not only the garments worn in the day, but their “armor” also; by cultivating and praying for all those holy dispositions which arm the soul to repel temptation, and are at the same time its ornament and beautiful attire: even as the burnished armor is deemed the conqueror’s most honorable decoration. (Marg. Ref. d—g.—Notes, Is. 59:16—19. 2 Cor. 10:1—6. Eph. 6:14—20. 1 Thes. 5:4—11.) The apostle, therefore, exhorted the Romans, to join with him in walking after a becoming and consistent manner, as those who enjoyed the light of the word of God, and the hope of heaven; keeping at a distance from all excess or intemperance, and sensual or jovial festivity; from all sloth; from every approach to unchastity, and every wanton look, word, or action; and from all contention, fierce zeal, envy, and malevolence. (Marg. Ref. h—m.)—And then, instead of multiplying exhortations, he called upon them “to put on the Lord Jesus,” and thus do the whole at once. Let the mind and example of Christ be reflected in all their tempers and conduct; that all, who saw their piety, purity, zeal, benevolence, and self-denial, might recognize the image and character of Christ in them. That, as they stood justified before God in the robe of his righteousness imputed to them; so they might appear before men adorned with his image for sanctification. (Notes, Gal. 3:26—29.) Then they would not contrive means, or seek for opportunities, of gratifying any of their carnal inclinations, nor would they be anxious to provide for the indulgence of their appetites; but they would seek and find satisfaction in such things, as pertained to the life of their soul. (Marg. Ref. n, o.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

The grace of the gospel directs our thoughts to the providence of God, as well as to his promises and commandments: and thus it induces submission and cheerful composure; where pride and the carnal mind see nothing but cause for murmurs and disquietude.—Christians should always remember, that there is “no power, but what is” derived from God; “that the powers that be, are ordained of God,” though perhaps not according to what we might think the most eligible plan: indeed he often scourges guilty nations by delivering them into the hands of oppressive rulers. “Every soul” however is bound to “be subject to the higher powers:” that while so many, disclaiming every yoke, “are not afraid to speak evil of dignities,” and want to level all other distinctions, in order that themselves may rise to distinction, by “resisting the power and despising the ordinance of God;” there may be also a protest in the land, against turbulent innovators, entered into by a great multitude, “who fear God, honor the king, and meddle not with those that are given to change.” (Note, Prov. 24:21,22.)—Indeed it is far more agreeable to the pride of man, to rise to reputation, by declaiming against kings and princes; than to be employed in humbling ourselves before God for our own sins, and in diligently mortifying our own corrupt inclinations. But surely, there can be no sufficient reason, why ministers of the gospel, and private Christians, should leave their peaceful duties, and bring the truth into disgrace, by becoming volunteers in such services, as apostles, evangelists, and martyrs, never intermeddled with! In our happy land, however, the advantages derived from civil government are immense; our grievances are comparatively minute, and often imaginary; and rather the fault of human nature, than of our constitution, or public administration. For speculators on this subject (even such as profess to believe the doctrine of man’s entire depravity,) almost universally blame this or the other form of government, for those evils which in fact are inseparable from fallen nature; and they expect that benefit from the change of forms or persons, which can only be produced by the renovation of men’s hearts to the holy image of God; and the mortification of that inordinate self-love, and idolatrous love of the world, which are universal to mankind. (Note, Is. 32:15. P. O. 9—20.) Let then Christians recollect, that “the world lieth in wickedness,” and that they are “strangers and pilgrims” in it; that their time here is short; that it is their wisdom and duty to make the best of things as they find them; that submission to the providence and command of God requires their peaceable subjection to governors; and that in refusing this subjection, they rebel against God, and must give an account to him of it. In general our rulers are, what all rulers ought to be, “a terror to evil doers, and not to those who do well;” as the honest and conscientious have nothing to fear from them, but enjoy great security and religious toleration, in what manner soever they choose to worship God; and as, with few, if any exceptions, none are made afraid, but those who ought to fear; even they whom the magistrate, as “the minister of God, a revenger to execute wrath upon evil doers;” must punish, unless he would “bear the sword in vain.” So that in every way it is incumbent on us “to be subject, not only for wrath, but also for conscience’ sake.”—At the same time magistrates may hence learn, from whom, and for what, they have their power, and what account they must render of it; that they too may attend to their duty in the fear of God, with “whom there is no respect of persons;” remembering the solemn and strict account, which they must render to God, of their important talents, when it shall be said unto them, “Give an account of thy stewardship, for thou mayest no longer be steward.”—It is also incumbent upon Christians to be exact and exemplary in paying tribute and custom; considering their rulers as “the ministers of God for their good;” and receding from their personal interests for the public advantage. They should therefore avoid all appearance of those covetous and fraudulent practices, by which so many plunder their fellow-citizens, in withholding their share of the public revenue. And they ought also to refrain from contumelious and disrespectful language, concerning their governors, and set an example of “rendering fear to whom fear, and honor to whom honor is due.” Let then those, who eagerly declaim concerning liberty, without distinguishing it from licentiousness, seriously ask themselves, whether their reasoning can be made consistent with such scriptures as these? Whether Christ, his apostles, or his primitive disciples, ever spent their zeal about such topics? And whether such declamations and frequent invectives against those, whom the scripture commands us to honor and obey, can be for the credit of the gospel, and the benefit of true religion?—As to the efforts, which are any where made by those, on whom such trusts constitutionally devolve, to preserve, increase, or assist, the real liberty of mankind, personal, civil, or religious; or to check the career of despotism or oppression, over men of any climate, complexion, or religion; let us zealously forward them with our prayers, and by every means consistent with the peace and good order of the community: and, if we would enjoy the blessing of good government, we should pray earnestly and constantly for our rulers, and all in authority; else we have no just cause to complain of any real or supposed grievances, to which we may be subjected by them. (Notes, 1 Tim. 2:1,2.)

V. 8—14.

While we rejoice at deliverance from the condemnation of the holy law of God, may its precepts be written in our hearts, and transcribed into our lives: that prudence, honesty, and punctuality may mark all our transactions, and regulate all our expenses, and the payment of our debts, and make way for liberal kindness to the poor. May we learn to “love all men as ourselves;” and then we shall not only avoid gross injuries to their persons, connexions, property, or characters; but we shall do no kind or degree of “evil to any man,” but shall study to be useful and beneficial in every relation and station of life.—The longer we have heard and professed the gospel, the more should we deem ourselves bound to shake off all sloth: and the nearer our salvation approaches, the more diligent should we be to finish the work of life, and to go forth to meet our Lord: exulting in the prospect of having speedily done with sin and conflict; and being admitted into the presence of God our Saviour, “where is fulness of joy, and pleasures at his right hand for evermore:” saying, with dying Jacob, “I have waited for thy salvation, O Lord.”

—Emerging from the night of unconversion, and the twilight of our first glimmering views of heavenly things, and looking forward to the day of perfect knowledge and purity; (Notes, Prov. 4:18,19. Hos. 7:1—3. John 8:12. Rev. 21:22—27.—P. O. Is. 42:13—25.) let us reject and flee from the works of darkness, and “put on the whole armor of light;” let us study to walk in a manner consistent with our profession, and honorable to it; to avoid every kind of excess, and inexpedient indulgence, and all spiritual as well as carnal wickedness: and, instead of “making provision for the flesh to indulge its lusts;” let us study to “put on the Lord Jesus Christ,” to imbibe his spirit, to copy his conduct, to walk in every respect even as he walked.

CHAP. XIV.

Christians should receive candidly “the weak in faith,” and not despise or judge one another, in respect of things doubtful or indifferent, 1—6; but consider their relation and accountability to Christ, 7—12. Exhortations to caution, charity, humility, and self-denial, in using their Christian liberty, 13—23.

Note.—Notwithstanding the authority vested by Christ in his apostles, and their infallibility in delivering his doctrine to mankind; differences of opinion prevailed even among real Christians: nor did St. Paul, by an express decision and command, attempt to put a final termination to them. (Notes, 2—6, 14—18.) A proposition indeed may be certain and important truth; yet a man cannot profitably receive it without due preparation of mind and heart. Indeed he must himself perceive the nature, evidence, and excellency of the doctrine, and the grounds on which it rests, before he can make any good use of it: so that a compelled assent to any doctrine, or conformity to any outward observances, without conviction, would in general be hypocrisy, and entirely unavailing. So essential are the rights and existence of private judgment, in all possible cases, to the exercise of true religion! and so useless an incumbrance would an infallible judge be, for deciding controversies, and producing unanimity among Christians! (Note, 2 Pet. 1:20,21.)—The apostle had sufficiently declared his mind respecting the ritual law of Moses: and where attention to it was likely to interfere with the simplicity of men’s dependence on Christ, he zealously contended against it. (Notes, 4: 9:30—33, 10:1—4. Gal. 5:1—6.) If the method of subsequent ages had been then in use, the persons here spoken of would have been excluded from the church, and anathematized as obstinate heretics; or driven for relief to their consciences, to separate from those, who imposed on them what they counted sinful: and afterwards they would have been shunned and stigmatized as schismatics. But St. Paul, in all the plenitude of his apostolical authority, could endure his fellow Christians to differ from him in opinion, as to matters of inferior consequence: and, instead of peremptory injunctions, he gave a general rule of the greatest importance, for our conduct in all similar cases. He exhorted the pastors and members, of the church at Rome, to receive among them, as a brother, the weak believer; and not to perplex him with disputations about such things, as might appear doubtful to conscientious persons; but to leave him, under the general use of means, and loving instructions, to grow stronger in faith and riper in judgment, by the inward teaching of the Holy Spirit. This general rule applies to many particulars, both respecting doctrine, worship and practice. If a man do not profess repentance, and a believing dependence, as a justly condemned sinner, on the righteousness and atonement of Christ, “Emmanuel,” “God manifest in the flesh,” and a reliance on the Holy Spirit for teaching and sanctification; it does not appear, that he can properly be regarded as a believer, or admitted into the communion of the saints. (Note, 2 John 7—11.) But when these things are professed in words, and not denied in works, a man ought at least to be received as one, who is “weak in the faith;” and more established believers should meekly help him forward, though he may yet be under the power of many prejudices and mistakes. (Note, 15:1—3.)—The force of the ‘apostle’s admirable reasoning in favor of candor and mutual condescension, cannot be elevated by saying, as some have unhappily done, ‘... that there was no separation between Jewish and Gentile Christians.—Had the things, judged indifferent by the latter, and apprehended sinful by the former, been imposed; a separation of communion would have ensued, and the schism, on the apostle’s principles, would have been chargeable on the imposers. When it shall please God to awaken in the governors of established protestant churches such a spirit of moderation and goodness, joined with a true zeal for religion; as to leave such things in that natural state of indifference, in which almost all sensible men confess it best they should be left, many separations will cease of course.’ Doddridge.—Thus the guilt of schism is reciprocally charged, by all parties, on their opponents; and indeed truly, when it is not done exclusively; or so as to suppose that all the fault lies on one side. For the same state of mind and heart generally prevails, in those who impose unscriptural terms of communion: and in those who separate themselves from their brethren, without sufficient reason; and then endeavor to make the cause of their separation appear as cogent as they can, in order to justify themselves. So that, not only the governors of protestant established churches; but the leading men among dissenters, and seceders also, need to be brought, by the illumination and grace of the Holy Spirit, to a fuller knowledge of the scriptures, and more entire conformity to the temper there inculcated. In proportion as men approach nearer and nearer, in judgment and disposition, to the word of God, they will be brought nearer to each other; as the lines, from the circumference of a circle, approximate to each other, and to the centre, proportionably. Then each person concerned (instead of decidedly justifying every particular among those with whom he is connected, and disputing against every thing in use, among such as he differs from,) will seriously compare all particulars, on every side, with the sacred oracles; and in consequence, will discover, that neither party is entirely right, and neither entirely wrong. And this conviction, avowed and reduced to practice by the leading men, would gradually be communicated to the rest of the body: and would make way for such amendments, retrenchments, and concessions, on all sides, and such fairness, gentleness, and candor, in debating on the controverted subjects, as would in process of time effectually terminate our unhappy divisions. But "until the Spirit be poured upon us from on high," it cannot be expected that these events will generally take place. It is, however, highly important, that individuals should well consider, from what source contentions in the church, as well as "wars and fightings in the world," actually arise; and what is indispensably necessary, in order to terminate them. [Practical Observations.]

Note.—The apostle next proceeded to exemplify his general rule, by a particular instance. One Christian, either a Gentile convert, or a Jew who had been set free from the prejudices of his nation, believed it lawful to eat any kind of meat, without regarding the distinctions of the law in that respect: another, either a Jewish convert, or one who had imbibed Jewish prejudices, would eat only vegetables, (especially when in company with Gentile converts,) lest he should unawares eat some unclean thing. This indeed showed, that he was weak and unestablished in the faith and in religious knowledge; yet it evinced him to be conscientious. (Marg. Ref. d—f.—Notes, Dan. 1:8-16. Acts 10:9-16. 1 Cor. 10:23-28.) Here then mutual candor ought to be exercised: the Christian, who knew and used his liberty, must not despise his weak brother, as ignorant or superstitious; and so disdain to associate with him, or use contemptuous language respecting him. On the other hand, the scrupulous believer must by no means condemn his brother, as self-indulgent or lax in his conduct; or shun him, and speak censoriously of him on that account. For God had accepted him, and taken him into his family, without regarding these distinctions: and it did not behove any one to "judge" and condemn "another man's servant," for those things against which his own master did not object. The professed Christian was only accountable to his own Lord, who would justify or condemn him, uphold him or leave him to fall, as he saw his real character to be: and, if indeed he was a believer, the power and promise of God were engaged to uphold him, and were abundantly sufficient for that purpose. by the law of God, and accordingly they regarded them in a religious manner: others were satisfied, that the ritual law was abrogated, and that these appointments were no longer obligatory, so that in this respect they regarded every day alike: for we cannot suppose that they did not observe the Lord's day, or any days of fasting and prayer, or thanksgiving. (Notes, Gal. 4:8—11. Col. 2:16,17.) In such matters, it was chiefly necessary, that every man should be fully satisfied in his own mind, as to his duty, and that he acted from proper motives in it. If then a Christian "regarded a day" according to the law of Moses, or conscientiously set it apart for devotion; he might be supposed to do it from reverence to the authority of God. And if another Christian, deeming these distinctions to be superseded, omitted all regard to those days, which the other accounted holy; it should be supposed, that he did it with a view to the honor of Christ, of his legislative authority, and his fulfillment of all the ancient typical observances. In like manner, the believer, who ate any kind of food, should be considered as regarding the will and glory of the Lord in it; while he returned thanks both for his food, and for his Christian liberty: on the other hand, he that refrained from this or the other meat, being contented with what he did eat, and thankful for it, should be considered as doing it from a self-denying and conscientious regard to the will of the Lord, even though his scruples were judged to be groundless. 7 For none of us liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself.

8 For whether we live, we live unto the Lord; and whether we die, we die unto the Lord: whether we live therefore, or die, we are to the Lord's.

9 For to this end Christ both died, and rose, and revived, that he might be Lord both of the dead and living.

Note.—It ought to be established as an acknowledged principle, that no real Christian allows his own humor, indulgence, interest, credit, or ease, to be the end for which he lives or acts, as to the general tenor of his conduct, nor does he even avoid, desire, or meet death from selfish motives: but whether his life be prolonged, he aims to spend it to the glory of Christ; or whether death be expected, he refers it to him, to be ordered in all respects for the glory of his own name. So that whether the Christian lives or dies, he belongs to the Lord, to be disposed of as he pleases; and as the object of his love, to be taken care of by him in all possible events. (Marg. Ref. q—s.) For to this very end Christ both died on the cross, and rose again, and liveth in heaven to die no more; that in human nature he might be the sovereign Lord of all his people, both during their lives and after their death: as they willingly devote themselves to him, and are prompt to labor, suffer, or die for his sake; as he orders all things respecting the time and circumstances of their death, for his own glory and their good; and as, when they die, they are taken to be with him for ever, and he will raise their bodies to share the same felicity. (Notes, 1 Cor. 6:18—20. Phil. 1:19—26.)—Christ is also the Lord of all the dead, and of the living, who do not believe in him: he spares their lives, or cuts them off by death, and executes vengeance upon them as he sees good: yet the former sense seems to have been principally intended. (Marg. Ref. t, u.—Notes, Matt. 28:18. Acts 10:36—43. Eph. 1:15—23. Rev. 1:12—20.) It is worthy of observation, that the apostle most cogently showed professed Christians, what they ought to be and do, by stating the character and aims of true believers, and by teaching them what charity would suppose, concerning their brethren who differed from them, if their conduct were in other respects consistent with their profession.—"The Lord," evidently means Jesus Christ, in these verses; which contain a very conclusive argument in proof of his Deity, and the next verses undeniably confirm it: for to what mere creature can we be thus entirely devoted, without manifest idolatry, and evidently giving to another that supreme affection, which God himself demands? (Notes, 2 Cor. 5:18—15. Tit. 2:14.)

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—This suggested another reason, why Christians should not “judge” or “despise” one another: as they must all stand in judgment before Christ, when it would be fully made known from what motives every man had acted. (Marg. Ref. y.—Notes, 1 Cor. 4:3—5. 2 Cor. 5:9—12. Rev. 20:11—15.)—The prophecy referred to has been before explained of Christ, as “JEHOVAH, our Righteousness.” (Marg. Ref. z---c---Notes, Is. 45:23—25. Phil. 2:9—11.)—The apostle’s transition from “the judgment-seat of Christ,” to “giving an account of ourselves to God,” shows how familiar it was to him, to understand the predictions uttered by JEHOVAH, as the words of his divine Lord and Saviour.—Shall confess to God. (11) ‘That is, shall adore and acknowledge me as God.’ Beza. (Note, 10:5—11.)—‘If these words, which the prophet certainly spake of JEHOVAH, ... be well applied by the apostle to Christ; Christ, must also be the Person intended by them: for how could the apostle prove, that “every knee must bow” to Christ from the words of God, “to me every knee shall bow;” if Christ were, in his whole nature and essence, as different from that God who spake those words of himself, as is a creature from his great Creator?’ Whitby.—As I live, &c. (11) Neither exactly from the Sept. nor from the Hebrew; but giving the precise meaning of each. (Is. 45:23.)

Note.—(Notes, 2:1—3. Matt. 7:1—5. Jam. 4:11,12.) The apostle concludes this part of his subject, by exhorting Christians, not to judge, censure, or condemn one another, any more; especially the Jewish converts should not judge their Gentile brethren: and he then enters on another exhortation, in which the Gentile converts were principally concerned. This he introduces by using the same word, in somewhat a different sense. Instead of exercising their judgment about others, let them learn to act judiciously in their own conduct, that they might not ensnare their brethren, or occasion them to sin: as if a man should heedlessly lay a stone, or a trap, in another’s way, which might occasion his falling, or being hurt. This they would be apt to do, by an inexpedient use of lawful things. The apostle assuredly knew, by the revelation of Christ, that no kind of food was any longer polluted in itself: yet if a man supposed the ceremonial distinctions to be still in force, the meat which he ate, contrary to his judgment and conscience, would be unclean to him; and he therefore ought to abstain, till more fully satisfied. (Marg. Ref. h—k.—Notes, Acts 10:9—16. 1 Cor. 8:7—13. 1 Tim. 4:1—5.) Now, if a stronger and better informed believer induced his weaker brother, by his example and influence, to eat such things as his conscience protested against, and so to bring guilt and distress upon himself; it was obvious that he did not “walk charitably,” loving his brother as himself. For his conduct directly tended to the ruin of one, for whom Christ died; seeing it tempted him to sin, which naturally leads to condemnation. (Marg. Ref. l—n.—Note, Jam. 1:13—15.) This does not imply, that the weak brother would actually perish: but the contrast is made between the love of Christ to the weak believer, who shed his blood to save him; and the want of love in his stronger brother, who would not abridge himself of his indulgent meal, from regard to his welfare; but would rather prove an occasion of sin to him, and so hazard the loss of his soul, than restrain himself in the exercise of his Christian liberty!—Yet, had the apostles written in that exact systematical style, which some affect and require; they would scrupulously have avoided such language. (Note, 2 Pet. 2. 1—3.)—Christians ought then to be very careful not to use their liberty, which was good and valuable in itself, in so unguarded a manner, or with such bad effects, as might give occasion to its “being evil spoken of:” for the privileges of the kingdom of God, no more consisted in meats and drinks, than its requirements did: so that a believer, who would use his liberty, at any rate and at all events, laid as undue a stress on the indulgence of the new dispensation, as a Jewish convert did on the ceremonial distinctions of the old one. To stand justified before God, to be at peace with him, to possess peace in the heart and conscience, and to experience that pure joy, which the Holy Spirit communicates, are the great privileges of the kingdom of God: (Notes, Matt. 3:2. 6:33,34.) and to walk by faith before him as a reconciled Father, in righteousness, and in cheerful holy obedience, according to the grand requirements of the moral law, by "the sanctification of the Spirit," is the substance of the duties of the kingdom: and he, who in such things serves and obeys Christ, is "acceptable to God," and is approved before men to be a true believer; and should therefore be received as such by his brethren, without respect to difference of opinion or practice in more doubtful matters. (Marg. Ref. p, q.—Note, 1.)—To infer from hence, as some have incautiously done, that a peaceable exemplary Christian, who is not too rigid in his sentiments, or tinctured with bigotry, will generally be esteemed and loved by mankind; would imply a censure on Paul, on the other apostles, on the prophets, on the most eminent believers in every age, nay, on Christ himself, as if they had not been so candid and liberal as we ought to be: for we know what favor the world showed them. But in fact the men of the church, and not those of the world, are exclusively meant.—It evidences a cruel mind, 'to make greater account of food, than of a brother's salvation; which they do, who can endure to eat, when it causes a brother to offend, and so gives him occasion of turning 'aside from the gospel. ... We ought to copy 'the example of Christ, who, so far from destroying the weak for food, poured out his life 'for them.' *Beza. (Notes, Eph. 5:1,2. Phil. 2:5--8. 1 John 3:16,17.)—Grieved. 19 Let us therefore <sup>y</sup> follow after the things which make for peace, <sup>z</sup> and things wherewith one may edify another.

Note.—The apostle proceeded to inculcate an assiduous and persevering attention to the interests of peace among Christians; and to all those things by which mutual edification might be promoted. (Notes, Heb. 12:14. Jan. 3:13--18.) Let then none of those, who understood their Christian liberty, allow their own indulgence in food to counteract "the work of God," in the conversion of the Jews, the success of the gospel, or the sanctification of believers; or to destroy any of his rational creatures. Indeed the apostle would have it known, as his decided judgment, (though he had been educated a Pharisee,) that all kinds of meats were alike pure in themselves: yet it would be evil for a man to eat them, when it had a direct tendency to seduce a weak brother into sin. (Marg. Ref. y—d.—Notes, 13--18. 1 Tim. 4:1--5.) Nay, so much ought love to preponderate over all considerations of this kind, that it would be "good" and right, for a man to abstain wholly from flesh and wine, and every other indulgence, by which his brother might be tempted to sin, disquieted in his conscience, or weakened in his hope and the vigor of his obedience. (Marg. Ref. e—g.—Notes, 1 Cor. 8:7--13. 9:13--23. 10:23--31.) So that those who had stronger faith, and assuredly believed they might lawfully eat any kind of food, should not make ostentation of it, or improperly seize on every occasion of acting according to it: but rather possess it as in the sight of God, who would know their uprightness, when others judged them on that account. Thus they ought to use their liberty with humility, caution, prudence, and self-denial; and without seeming to prefer themselves, or to despise their weaker brethren: and he would be a happy man, who was free from all doubt or self-condemnation, in those things which he allowed himself to do. But if any one doubted whether this or the other indulgence were lawful or not; and yet example, persuasion, or inclination prevailed with him to venture upon it; he would certainly commit a sin, for which his conscience would condemn him, and for which God would condemn him, if he did not repent of it. For, as he did it not "of faith," as he was not fully persuaded in his own mind, that he was allowed by the scripture to do it; he would be guilty of preferring his own inclination to the dictates of his conscience and the will of God, as he at the time supposed it to be.—In general, every action must be sinful, which is not done "of faith," as satisfied by our views of the word of truth, that we are acting according to the command or by the allowance of God, and may therefore consider ourselves to be in the way of his promised blessing. (Marg. Ref. g-i.—Note, Col. 3:16, 17.)—It is obvious how groundless the scruples of some serious persons from this text, concerning the Lord's supper, must be: for the apostle's argument is about a subject entirely of another nature.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—4.

It is of great importance for us to distinguish, between those who are “weak in faith,” and such as are strangers or enemies to the faith: for we ought to receive and affectionately to cherish the former, but to beware of the latter and withdraw from them. It is, however, very difficult for us to bear properly with the mistakes, infirmities, and prejudices of our brethren; or to make due allowances for the weakness of natural capacity, the bias of bad education, or the effects of a partial and erroneous instruction, under their first religious impressions. We are all prone to make our own views the standard of truth, to deem things certain, which to others appear doubtful; to expect, by eager disputation, to bring men to see with our eyes: to perplex new converts with topics which they cannot as yet understand; and to expect them at once to acquiesce in all those truths, which we have been learning for years. (Notes, Mark 4:33,34. John 16:12,13. 1 Cor. 3:1—3. Heb. 5:11—14.) So that, it is almost impracticable to prevail with those, to receive and hold communion with each other, who have been received by the Lord and enjoy communion with him! Thus some have been expelled by their brethren, or have separated from them; and contests or schisms have disgraced the church, grieved her best friends, and rejoiced her enemies: thus Christians have despised or condemned each other, about doubtful or unimportant matters, as if the very essence of faith and piety had been concerned! The distinctions between meats and days were at least as important, as many things which are now controverted among us; and it was far more certain on which side the truth was found. Yet men might be real Christians, who could not receive even the apostle's determination on the controversy. Surely then we should enlarge our candor, beyond those narrow limits which many would assign to it. And if we could demonstrate every tittle of our doctrine, and every part of our worship, to be scriptural; yet we ought not to despise or condemn a man, because he is not able to see the conclusiveness of our arguments; and if we must assume it as undeniable, that he is just as far mistaken, as he differs from us; we should at least treat him with that tenderness, which we show to one, who wants an eye, a leg, or an arm. All who love the gospel ought to shun such persons as excite divisions among those, who appear to love Christ and hate sin: and such shibboleths, as tend to multiply, to perpetuate, or to exasperate them. (Note, Judg. 12:1—7. P. O.) Let us then cease to despise or judge one another, especially about things which are not essential to salvation; let us beware, that we do not attempt to reject, or to cast down, those whom God has received and will uphold; or to judge and condemn his conscientious servants. V. 5—12.

It behoves us, to remember our own unworthiness and proneness to err, and liability to be deceived through inattention, ignorance, prejudices, and corrupt passions, and the numerous instances, in which we have been entirely mistaken, when confident that we were in the right: and, endeavoring to be “fully persuaded” in our own minds about our conduct, as regulated according to the holy scriptures; let us leave others to the judgment of God. Thus, if some deem it expedient to observe a day, in commemoration of any of those great events which relate to our salvation, let them spend it in a holy manner to the glory of God; and if others judge it best not to observe such days, let them act with humble simplicity, in dissenting from the opinion and practice of their brethren. Then all may be done in a quiet, peaceable, thankful, and Christian manner; as it becomes those who profess neither “to live nor to die to themselves, but to him who died for them and rose again;” and “ever liveth to be the Lord both of the dead and of the living.” Instead of censuring, reviling, deriding, or despising one another; let us all daily and diligently prepare to appear before the judgment-seat of Christ; as he has sworn, that “every knee shall bow and every tongue shall confess to him.” (Notes, Matt. 24:45—51. Luke 12:35—46. Jam. 5:9—11. 2 Pet. 3:10—16.) We should therefore carefully judge ourselves, both as to our state and conduct; that our confession of Christ may at that solemn and important season be proved genuine, by the fruits of our grateful love, and devoted obedience to him. V. 13—23.

While we shun superstitious scruples, and assert our Christian liberty, let us beware of spiritual pride and self-preference: and while we pity such as are yet harassed with groundless scruples, and held in bondage to uncommanded observances, let us be careful not to abuse our liberty, by an inexpedient use of things lawful, or by venturing upon such as are doubtful. Let us in all things consider what effects our conduct and example may have on others: and, though it may not be proper in every case to humor the scrupulosity of some persons; yet, when there is a probability of grieving, offending, or turning aside a weak believer, or of stumbling a hopeful inquirer; we should waive our liberty, if nothing, of far more importance than our own indulgence, call for the exercise of it. For surely, it cannot be an imitation of the love of Christ, who died for the weak as well as the strong, if we put any personal satisfaction, in competition with the spiritual good of our brethren. Verily it must be confessed that we are often very criminal in such matters; and thus our "good comes to be evil spoken of," because we use lawful things in an uncharitable and selfish manner. But let us remember that both the comforts and the obedience of the gospel are alike superior to meats and drinks; and that both unite in "righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost;" and that, when we most highly value these spiritual privileges, and abound in these spiritual duties, we enjoy the greatest assurance that we are accepted by God, and best approve ourselves before men, to be real believers. Let us then follow after all those things, which tend to peace and mutual edification: let us study a holy indifference about the most lawful earthly enjoyments; and learn to renounce whatever comes in competition with the welfare of our brethren, the peace of the church, and the glory of God. Let us pray for deeper humility, and increasing promptitude in self-denial, that we may more regard our acceptance with God, and less desire the applause of men.—In every doubtful or indifferent matter, "happy is he, who condemneth not himself in the thing which he alloweth." Numbers venture into places, and upon actions, against which their own consciences revolt: because they are induced by inclination; or emboldened by the example of those, who on some account have obtained the reputation of pious men. But whether the things themselves be lawful or not; as they cannot "do them in faith," as they hesitate concerning the lawfulness of them, and as they cannot heartily pray for the presence and blessing of God in them; they are condemned for indulging themselves in a doubtful case. But few are so happy, as to be quite free from self-condemnation in every thing which they allow: a sound judgment, a simple heart, a tender conscience, and habitual self-denial, are necessary for the enjoyment of this comfort: and most of us see frequent cause to condemn ourselves in this respect, and, by daily repentance, faith, and prayer, to deprecate the merited condemnation of our God. (Notes, 1 Cor. 6:12—17. 8:7—13. 10:23—28. 1 John 3:18—24.)

CHAP. XV.

In condescension to the weak, the strong ought to give up their own inclination, for the good of others, after the example of Christ, 1—3. All scriptures were written for our instruction, 4. The apostle prays for love and harmony among believers, in the worship of God, 5—7; shows that the scriptures foretel the union of Jews and Gentiles in the service of God; and subjoins a fervent prayer, 8—13. He exhorts the Christians at Rome, as the apostle of the Gentiles, 14—16; and states his extensive labors and usefulness, 17—21. He avows his purpose of visiting Rome, in his way to Spain desires their prayers in respect of his previous journey to Jerusalem, with the contributions of the Gentile converts, 22—32; and again prays for them, 33.

3 For even <sup>e</sup> Christ pleased not himself: but, as it is written, <sup>f</sup> The reproaches of them that reproached thee fell on me.

Note.—The apostle here proceeds with the argument of the preceding chapter. He admits that those who knew their liberty, in respect of the distinctions of meats and days, were generally "strong" in faith, as well as sound in judgment, compared with their more scrupulous brethren. But, for that reason, those "who were strong," ought not only to "bear with the infirmities of the weak," who were not able to rise superior to them; and not to despise them: but even to bear their infirmities, by patiently submitting to self-denial on their account, and meekly enduring their uncharitable censures; while they persevered in endeavors to promote their welfare, and to maintain a peaceful communion with them. They should act, as those who travel in a company; when those, who are strong and healthy, pay peculiar attention to the sick and feeble, carrying their burdens, waiting for them, and inviting them to lean upon their arms. So that, instead of pleasing and gratifying themselves, in the indulgent use of their liberty, or giving way to pride, self-will, or resentment; they ought readily to recede from their own inclinations, in order to "please their neighbor," as far as could conduce to his good, or to mutual edification, by obviating his prejudices and gaining upon his affections. (Marg. Ref. a—d.—Note, Gal. 6:1—5.) Thus Christ, from love to sinners, renounced his own ease, comfort, and reputation; (Marg. Ref. e.—Notes, Matt. 20:24—28. John 13:12—17. Phil. 2:5—8.) exposed himself to the reproach and revilings of the enemies of God; and lived, in this polluted miserable world, exposed to contempt, calumnies, and persecutions, till he finished his sufferings by the ignominious death of the cross, amidst the insults of his embittered murderers: according as it had been predicted of him by David. that we through patience and comfort of the scriptures might have hope.

5 Now the God of patience and consolation grant you to be like-minded one toward another, according to Christ Jesus:

6 That ye may with one mind and one mouth glorify God, even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.

7 Wherefore receive ye one another, as Christ also received us to the glory of God.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The apostle took occasion from the preceding quotation, to remind the Christians at Rome, that the whole of the ancient scriptures had been written for "their instruction," as much as for that of those to whom they were first delivered: whether they contained types and predictions of Christ, or gracious promises, precepts, admonitions, or examples: in order that, by patiently cleaving to the Lord in faith and holy obedience, amidst all their trials and temptations; and by taking comfort from the daily perusal of the scriptures; they might possess a joyful hope of heaven, notwithstanding past sins and present manifold defects, as well as many and grievous trials. (Marg. Ref. g, h.—Notes, 1 Cor. 10:11,12. 2 Tim. 3:14—17. Heb. 6:16—20. 13:5,6. 2 Pet. 1:19—21.) He therefore prayed for them, to the "God of patience and consolation," who is infinitely patient and long-suffering towards men, who commands them in like manner to bear with one another, and who is the Author and Giver of patience and persevering constancy in well doing to his people, and the Source of all their consolations, that he would render his exhortations effectual; and grant them to be of one judgment and one heart, disposed to entire harmony and affection, and full of disinterested love and compassion for each other, after the example of Christ, and according to his commands. That so nothing might hinder them from joining, as "with one mind and one mouth," in the worship of God, in glorifying him for his mercies, and adoring his perfections, as "the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ;" who is approached by sinners, through his beloved Son, and is become their reconciled Father in him. (Marg. Ref. i—n.—Notes, 12: 14—16, v. 16. Jer. 32:39—41. Zeph. 3:9,10. Acts 4:32—35, v. 32.) And, he again exhorted them to lay aside prejudices and disputes, and to receive one another as brethren, without regarding the distinctions of Jew and Gentile, or differences of opinion on subordinate matters: even as Christ had received them, without making exceptions to any of them; that God might be glorified in their salvation, as he would also be in their mutual love and harmony. (Marg. Ref. o—q.—Notes, 14:1. 1 Cor. 1:10—16. Eph. 4:1—6. Phil. 1:27—30. 2:1—4.)

8 Now I say that Jesus Christ was a minister of the circumcision for the truth of God, to confirm the promises made unto the fathers:

9 And that the Gentiles might glorify God for his mercy; as it is written, For this cause I will confess to thee among the Gentiles, and sing unto thy name.

10 And again he saith, Rejoice, ye Gentiles, with his people.

11 And again, Praise the Lord, all ye Gentiles; and laud him, all ye people.

12 And again Esaias saith, There shall be a root of Jesse, and he that shall rise to reign over the Gentiles; in him shall the Gentiles trust.

13 Now the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing, that ye may abound in hope, through the power of the Holy Ghost.

Note.—In order to unite Jews and Gentiles in one church, and conciliate them to each other, Jesus Christ assumed his human nature among the Jews; he was "made under the law," and was circumcised: and he exercised his personal ministry with unwearied labor and self-denial among circumcised persons; and he commanded his apostles to preach the gospel to the Jews, in the first place. Thus he fulfilled the predictions and promises, delivered to the fathers of that nation: the Gentile converts could therefore have no plausible excuse for despising them. (Marg. Christ, the gospel had, by his command, been extensively preached among the Gentiles, and with very great success; that they also might "glorify God for his mercy," as it had been expressly predicted by several of the ancient prophets. (Marg. Ref. u-c.—Notes, Deut. 32: 43. Ps. 18:49. 117: Is. 11:10.) So that the Jewish converts could have no reason to exclude or shun the Gentiles, whether they regarded the will of their ascended Lord, or the prophecies of the scripture. Indeed Isaiah had expressly stated, that the Gentiles would trust, or hope, in that Messiah, who should arise to reign over them: (Notes, Eph. 1:9-14. 1 Pet. 1:17-21.) and hence the apostle took occasion to pray, that God, the Author and Object of hope, would fill them with abundance of all spiritual joy and peace, by enabling them simply to believe in him, as revealed in his beloved Son, and relying on his gracious promises; that so they might attain to an assured, abiding, realizing, and anticipating hope of eternal life, through the sanctifying and comforting energy of the Holy Spirit. *Note.—The apostle, being about to conclude his epistle, shows the Romans on what grounds he, who had never seen them, had been induced to address them in so earnest and copious a manner. This did not arise from any doubt that he entertained concerning them: for he was persuaded, that they were so replete with that "goodness," that kind and affectionate spirit, which he had inculcated, as well as with knowledge in every part of the gospel, as to be able to "admonish one another," without other assistance. Nevertheless he had written with the more confidence to them, on several most important subjects, to put them in remembrance of their duties and their dangers; (Note, 2 Pet. 1:12-15.) because God had peculiarly favored him, in appointing him to be the apostle and the minister of Christ to the Gentiles. (Marg. Ref. g-l.—Notes, 1:5-7. 11:11-15. Acts 9:15,16. Gal. 2:6-10. Eph. 3:8.) His special ministry required him to preach the gospel among the Gentiles in general, and to superintend their affairs, (as the priest among the Jews used to do the sacrifice, or the burning of incense,) in order that their persons, and services, might be presented to God in an acceptable manner, by the hands of the great high Priest within the veil, being sanctified by the gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit; and he therefore thought himself called on to attempt this service towards them also. (Marg. Ref. m-q.—Notes, 12:1. Is. 66:19-23. Phil. 2:14-18.) For in this important trust he had some ground of glorying; not in himself, but in the unmerited and rich favor of Jesus Christ towards him; not in carnal things, but in those which pertained to God and his worship. 18 For 'I will not dare to speak of any of those things " which Christ hath not wrought by me, <sup>x</sup> to make the Gentiles obedient, <sup>y</sup> by word and deed,

19 Through <sup>z</sup> mighty signs and wonders, <sup>a</sup> by the power of the Spirit of God; <sup>b</sup> so that from Jerusalem, and round about unto Illyricum, I have <sup>c</sup> fully preached the gospel of Christ.

20 Yea, <sup>d</sup> so have I strived to preach the gospel, not where Christ was named, lest I should <sup>e</sup> build upon another man's foundation:

21 But as it is written, <sup>f</sup> To whom he was not spoken of, they shall see; and they that have not heard, shall understand.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The apostle's success had corresponded to the importance of the trust delegated to him. He would not dare to speak of what "Christ had not wrought by him," in bringing the heathen nations to obey the truth, "by word and deed." It seems that some teachers were forward to do this: but he would not venture to do himself, what he condemned as folly and sin in other men. (Marg. Ref. t—x.—Notes, 2 Cor. 10:12—16.) What had been done was entirely the work of Christ; but he had chosen to make use of him as his instrument. "Christ hath wrought by me." (Notes, Mark 16:19,20. Acts 15:12. 1 Cor. 3:4—9.) In other places it is said, "God wrought by him;" here "Christ wrought by him." His preaching had been attended with extraordinary miracles, wrought "by the power of the Holy Spirit," whose divine agency had also disposed the hearts of the hearers to embrace the gospel. So that from Jerusalem, in a very extensive circle of several thousands of miles, even to Illyricum on the borders of Italy, he "had fully preached the gospel of Christ," and instructed large multitudes, with great accuracy in that holy doctrine. (Marg. Ref. z—c.) Indeed it had been his ambition to carry the glad tidings of salvation to those, who had not before heard of Christ; and thus, to face the dangers and hardships of making the first assault on the kingdom of Satan, in every place. Nor was he disposed, in general, to "build on the foundation" laid by other ministers, who were competent to carry on the work which they had happily begun; but rather to fulfil the scripture, which foretold, that many nations and rulers would see and understand those things, which they had before been strangers to. (Notes, Is. 52:13—15. 1 Cor. 3:10—15.)—"Probably, in mentioning this, he may glance on those false apostles, who crept into churches which he had planted, and endeavored to establish their own reputation and influence there, by alien-ating the hearts of his own converts from him, 'their spiritual father: while, like some in our 'own days, ... they built on his grand and noble 'foundation, an edifice of wood, and hay, and 'stubble. 1 Cor. 3:12.' Doddridge.—By word and deed. (18) 'By the manner, in which he 'hath enabled me to speak, and the things 'which he hath strengthened me to perform.' Ibid. As there is no preposition in the Greek, the clause may be rendered, "In word and deed," and applied, as above, to the obedience of the Gentiles: and this seems better to accord with the general language of scripture. (Marg. Ref. y.)—Unto Illyricum. (19) 'I do not think, 'that these words necessarily import, that St. 'Paul had penetrated into Illyricum; ... but 'rather that he had come to the confines of 'Illyricum; and that these confines were the 'external boundary of his travels. ... Illyricum 'adjoins unto Macedonia, measuring from Jeru- 'salem towards Rome, it lies close behind it. 'If therefore St. Paul traversed the whole 'country of Macedonia; the route would neces- 'sarily bring him to the confines of Illyricum. 'Now the account of St. Paul's second visit to 'the peninsula of Greece is contained in these 'words. "He departed for to go into Macedo- 'nia, and when he had gone over those parts, 'and had given them much exhortation, he came 'into Greece." This account allows, or rather 'leads us to suppose, that St. Paul, in going 'over Macedonia, ... had passed so far to the 'west, as to come into those parts of the coun- 'try, which were contiguous to Illyricum, if he 'did not enter into Illyricum itself. The history 'and the epistle therefore so far agree; and the 'agreement is much strengthened by a coinci- 'dence of time. At the time when this epistle 'was written, St. Paul might say, in conformity 'to the history, that he had come unto Illyri- 'cum: much before this time he could not have 'said so; for upon his former journey into Ma- 'cedonia, his route is laid down, from the time 'of his landing at Philippi, to his sailing from 'Corinth; ... which confines him to the eastern 'side of the peninsula, and therefore keeps him 'all the while at a considerable distance from 'Illyricum.' 25 But now <sup>m</sup> I go unto Jerusalem, to minister unto the saints.

27 It hath pleased them verily; <sup>p</sup> and their debtors they are. For if the Gentiles have been made partakers of their spiritual things, their duty is also to minister unto them in carnal things.

28 When therefore I have performed this, <sup>q</sup> and have sealed to them this fruit, <sup>r</sup> I will come by you into Spain.

29 And I am sure that when I come unto you, I shall come <sup>s</sup> in the fulness of the blessing of the gospel of Christ.

Note.—As the Romans were already favored with the gospel, it did not accord with the apostle's plan to leave his more urgent employment to go among them: and this with other reasons, had long "hindered" him from visiting them. But, as he had now brought the churches which he had planted, to establishment in the faith; and as he had no immediate call to any new scene of action, in the parts where he had before labored; so he purposed to gratify the strong desire, which he had for many years experienced, of going to Rome. (Marg. Ref. g, h.—Note, 1:8—15.) But he also purposed a journey into Spain, a large country still much further to the west, where probably the gospel had not at that time been preached. In his way he designed to stay for a time at Rome; and when he had in part satisfied his affectionate desire of communing with the believers there, he expected they would help him forward toward Spain.—"In some degree:" for "I know, that if I were to indulge my own affection for you, my visit would be much longer, than the views of duty elsewhere will permit," Doddridge. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. i—l.) But, in the mean time, he must take a long journey in the opposite direction, in order to perform an important service to the poor Christians at Jerusalem, for whom the Gentile converts had raised a liberal contribution. (Marg. Ref. m—o.—Notes, Acts 24:10—21. 1 Cor. 16:1,2. 2 Cor. 8:9.) This they had done willingly: but indeed they were "debtors to them" to a very great amount. For the Jewish preachers had first carried the gospel among them; and the primitive believers at Jerusalem had impoverished themselves in promoting that doctrine, the blessing of which they now shared with the Gentiles. (Notes, Acts 2:44—47. 4:32—37. 11:27—30.) It was, therefore, the bounden duty of the Gentile converts to communicate to the Jewish Christians, of their temporal abundance. (Note, 2 Cor. 9:6—12.) When therefore he had performed this service, and had affixed his seal, as it were, to this good fruit produced by the Gentiles, in order to conciliate the minds of their Jewish brethren; he intended to pass by Rome to Spain. (Marg. Ref. s.) And whenever he should be permitted to come to them, he knew, and was confident, that he should be employed to communicate to them, an abundant supply of those spiritual gifts, consolations, and blessings, which are conveyed to sinners by "the gospel of Christ:" so that they would certainly be edified, established, comforted, and increased in numbers, by his coming, his preaching, and the miraculous powers which he should be employed to impart to them. (Marg. Ref. s.)—Thus the apostle never lost sight of his object, or let slip any opportunity, of inculcating mutual love between the Jewish and Gentile converts.—It is not known, whether the apostle ever accomplished his intended journey into Spain. But as Clement, writing from Rome, in the first century, said that he preached ... "to the utmost bounds of the west;" it is most probable that he did. He, however, went to Rome in a far different manner than he had proposed. (Notes, Acts 21:—28.)—I go unto Jerusalem. (25.) 'Here at length ... but 'fetched from three different writings, we have 'obtained the several circumstances, ... which 'the epistle to the Romans brings together; viz. 'a contribution in Achaia for the Christians at 'Jerusalem; a contribution in Macedonia for 'the same purpose; and an approaching journey of St. Paul to Jerusalem. We have these 'circumstances, each by some hint in the passage in which it is mentioned, or by the date 'of the writing in which the passage occurs, 'fixed to a particular time; and we have that 'time, turning out, upon examination, to be in 'all the same; namely, towards the close of St. Paul's second visit to the peninsula of Greece.' Paley.—This fixes the writing of this epistle to a particular part of the narrative of the apostle's labors: but there is some difficulty, in determining in what year those events took place. Some date them A. D. 58, others A. D. 60, or 61.

Note.—The apostle regarded his journey to Jerusalem as of so much importance, that he ought not to decline it: yet he was fully aware that it would be attended with great danger and difficulty, through the enmity of the Jews, and the strong prejudices even of the Christians in Judea against him; which neither his zeal in their behalf, nor the liberality of the Gentile converts could counterbalance. (Notes, Acts 19:21,22. 20:1—6,22—24. 21:7—26.) He therefore besought the Romans, “for the sake of Christ” their common Lord, and for that love's sake which the Spirit of Christ had wrought in their hearts to each other, (according to his own most loving nature and conduct towards them,) earnestly to unite in prayers for him, that he might be protected from the malice of the unbelieving or disobedient Jews, who would otherwise disappoint all the plans which he had formed; and that the prejudices of the Jewish believers might be so removed, that they might accept and take in good part the service which he went to perform. (Marg. Ref. t—a.) That so, if the Lord pleased, he might come to them, not grieved and disappointed, but “with joy” and comfort: and also that his spirit might be refreshed and enlivened by joining with them in thanksgivings to God, and by what he witnessed of the grace bestowed upon them. In the mean time he prayed, that “the God of peace” as reconciled to believers in Christ, and as disposing them to live together in peace and harmony, might be with them all, for their comfort, and to prevent all disputes and divisions among themselves. (Marg. Ref. b—d.—Notes, 16:17—20. 2 Tim. 4:22. Heb. 13:20,21. ‘If Paul, saith Esthius, might desire the prayers of the Romans, why might not the Romans desire the prayers of Paul? PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS

V. 1—7.

The powerful of this world often domineer over the weak, but it ought not to be so in the church of Christ: (Notes, Matt. 20:24—28. Luke 22:24—27.) on the contrary, every one, in proportion as he is strong in faith and grace, should be tender, patient, and compassionate to the feeble-minded, to those “who are compassed with infirmities;” perplexed in their views; harassed with scruples, doubts, and temptations; and unable to enjoy the peace and comfort of the gospel, while they appear to walk in the obedience of it. Even if their infirmities be attended with a degree of bigotry, censoriousness, or peevishness; we ought still to bear with them and pity them, and submit to self-denial for their good: and, instead of “pleasing ourselves;” whatever may become of them, we ought to give up our own humor and inclination, as far as we can “please them for their good unto edification;” though we must not be men-pleasers, or help to deceive them by our flatteries and compliances.—If any man deem himself “strong,” and he be at the same time disposed to revile, despise, condemn, and reject the weak and scrupulous, because they cannot accede to his whole system: it is evident that pride and selfishness are stronger in his heart, than faith and grace; and that he has more of “the knowledge that puffeth up,” than of the “love that edifieth;” or, of “the wisdom which is from above.” (Notes, 1 Cor. 8:1—3. 13:4—7. Jam. 3:13—18.) He is the most advanced Christian, who is most conformed to Christ, and most willing to renounce his own ease or indulgence, and to endure reproach and suffering, after his example, and in prosecution of that great design for which he shed his blood: and if, in doing this, he be reviled by zealots and uncharitable bigots, he may with humble accommodation use the Redeemer's words: “the reproaches of them that reproached thee, are fallen upon me.” For whatever is written, either in the Old or the New Testament, is intended for our instruction, and may be applied to our case, for direction and encouragement; that, by patient faith, persevering obedience, and comfort derived from the word of God, 'we may embrace, and ever hold fast, the blessed hope of everlasting life, as given to us in Jesus Christ.' Thus relying on the mercy and truth of "the God of all patience and consolation;" we should pray continually, that we, and our brethren in Christ, may be "like minded towards one another" after his example; that the divisions of the church being healed, all who are called by his name "may glorify the God and Father of our Lord Jesus, with one mind and with one mouth." And till this perfect union shall be effected, we should learn to agree, notwithstanding our differences about non-essentials; and to receive one another as brethren, while we hold the great doctrines of salvation for sinners, by the blood and Spirit of Christ; for this will tend greatly to the credit of the gospel, and the glory of God.

V. 8—21.

The whole plan of redemption is so formed, that it is suited to reconcile us to one another, as well as to our gracious God; and we may say of every contention among Christians, "An enemy hath done this."—The fulfilment of ancient promises and prophecies, in the coming of Christ among the Jews, and in the great success of the gospel among the Gentiles, and through distant nations and languages, that they might "glorify God for his mercy," and hope in that "Branch from the Root of Jesse," who was raised up to reign over them; should teach us "sinners of the Gentiles" especially to cease from our murmurings and disputings, and to join in grateful praises and thanksgivings to him, who glories in his merciful victories among the heathen, and has called them "to rejoice with his people, Israel." If we would have "the God of hope to fill our hearts with all peace and joy in believing;" (and we can have no abiding holy joy and peace in any other way;) if we would "abound in hope by the power of the Holy Ghost;" we must rely on and pray for the teaching and influences of that divine Agent; and we must be careful neither to grieve him by our evil tempers or sinful passions; nor to quench his sacred fire, by negligence, or procrastination: for thus we often bring darkness and disconsolation upon ourselves. (Notes, Eph. 4:30—32, 1 Thes. 5:16—22, v. 19.)—We should also hope the best of others, and commend what is good in their conduct: but those who are really most "full of goodness and knowledge, and able to admonish one another," will be most thankful to be reminded of their duty, and cautioned against danger, by those who are authorized to watch over them; who have "obtained grace to be faithful" in their ministry; and who evidently desire, that the persons and services of their brethren may be "acceptable to God through Jesus Christ, being sanctified by the Holy Spirit."—It is indeed an honor to be employed by the Lord Jesus, and for him to "work by us, in those things which pertain to God," and in rendering sinners "obedient in word and deed." But the whole glory must ultimately be referred to him: ostentation should carefully be avoided in speaking on such subjects: and it is seldom expedient to mention ourselves, except as we want to obviate men's prejudices against our ministry, when they impede our usefulness.—But indeed, how trivial are the labors, and how limited is the usefulness, of most of us, when compared with those of the apostle; whose ministry was attended "with the power of the Holy Ghost," in so remarkable a degree, and whose unwearied labors would admit of no bounds, but those of the human species, or of his own life!—It is honorable, when ministers, who have the opportunity, boldly face opposition and hardship in carrying the gospel to those places, where "Christ hath not yet been named;" and when they would rather make irruptions into the uninvaded provinces of Satan's dark domain, than more securely garrison such as have already been torn from him. This is a noble ambition: and in this the genuine missionary far more resembles the apostle, than any stated pastor or ruler of the church can do. He is the hero, the most honorable warrior under the banner of Christ, and should be assisted and honored accordingly. But as most of us must, in some measure, "build upon the foundation" that others have laid before us; we should at least "take heed how we build thereon," that our superstructure may not disgrace or expose the good foundation, as too often is the case.

V. 22—33.

Our best desires may meet with many hindrances; our well concerted plans may be disappointed; our very prayers may seem to remain unanswered: but, proceeding in the path of duty with self-denying zeal and love, endeavoring to conciliate the minds of Christians to one another, and to excite them to emulation in good works; and seeking our comfort in communion with God and his saints; all will surely terminate to our advantage: and even the services, which we would have performed and could not, shall be graciously accepted and rewarded. (Note, 1 Kings 8:15—21.)—The rich believer should deem himself a debtor to the poor; and they who have been made partakers of spiritual blessings, should count it "their duty" to minister in carnal things to those, through whom they were brought to the knowledge of salvation. (Notes, 1 Cor. 9:7—12, Gal. 6:6—10.)—There is a blessing, "a fulness of blessing, in the gospel of Christ," which we should expect to know and to communicate, but with which numbers are totally unacquainted, and which most of us experience in a degree far beneath what the primitive believers did: especially the degree, in which the preaching and labors of ministers at present are blessed to the conversion of sinners, and the edifying and rejoicing and fruitfulness of believers, compared with that of former times, is lamentably small. We should therefore "strive," may wrestle, "together in our prayers" for each other, that for "Christ's sake," and by "the love of the Spirit," a very great blessing may come upon the souls of Christians, and the labors of ministers: that envy, prejudice, and a party-spirit may not prevent the faithful zealous servants of Christ, from being "accepted by the saints," in their disinterested endeavors to do them good, as alas! is frequently the case, but that they may meet the people, wherever they go, with joy, and may by them be refreshed; and that the God of peace may be the ever-present Comforter of all, who "love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity." Amen.

CHAP. XVI

The apostle commends Phebe to the Christians at Rome, and sends salutations to many by name, 1-16. He warns them against those, who caused divisions and offences, 17-20. He names several brethren, who joined in their salutations of them, 21-23. He concludes with prayers for them, and ascriptions of glory to God, 24-27.

2 That<sup>e</sup> ye receive her in the Lord,<sup>f</sup> as becometh saints, and that ye assist her in whatsoever business she hath need of you: <sup>g</sup>for she hath been a succorer of many, and of myself also.

Note.—It is probable, that this epistle was sent by Phebe, according to what is generally added at the end of it, in our Bibles; but as these additions are of no authority, and sometimes palpably erroneous, they are not here inserted.—Cenchrea was the sea-port of Corinth, where a separate church was founded, which shows that the apostle wrote from Corinth. (Acts 18:18).—Phebe acted as a servant, or a deaconess, to the church at Cenchrea, and was probably employed in relieving the needy, and visiting the sick women among them. This she must have undertaken freely, out of love to the work alone, as she appears to have been a person in good circumstances. (Marg. Ref. b, c.—Notes, 1 Tim. 5:9-16.) The Christians at Rome were exhorted to receive her to their fellowship, in a manner consistent with their profession of being the "saints," or holy servants and worshippers of the true God, in Christ Jesus: (Marg. Ref. e, f;) and also to assist and support her in the business, which had brought her thither; as she had been helpful to many Christians, and to Paul himself, who was not backward to acknowledge his obligation to her.

3 Greet<sup>h</sup> Priscilla and Aquila<sup>i</sup> my helpers in Christ Jesus:

4 Who<sup>k</sup> have for my life<sup>l</sup> laid down their own necks: unto whom not only I give thanks, but<sup>m</sup> also all the churches of the Gentiles.

Note.—Aquila and Priscilla had now returned to Rome; though but a short time before they had been at Ephesus. (Marg. Ref. h, i.—Notes, Acts 18:1-6, 24-28. 1 Cor. 16:19, 20.) They had ventured their lives in protecting the apostle either at Corinth, or at Ephesus;

as if they had been willing to lay down their own necks, and to be beheaded in his stead: and as his life was so useful to all the churches of the Gentiles, they, as well as he, were under the greatest obligations to these pious persons. (Marg. Ref. k-m.) He therefore sent his affectionate salutations and good wishes to them, and to the church in their house; or to the several Christians, of whom their family was composed, and who met continually together to worship God.—Priscilla and Aquila had originally been inhabitants of Rome. (Acts 18:2.) ... They were connected therefore with the place to which the salutations were sent. ... St Paul became acquainted with them at Corinth during his first visit into Greece. They accompanied him upon his return into Asia; were settled for some time at Ephesus; (Acts 18:18-26.) and appear to have been with St. Paul when he wrote from that place his first epistle to the Corinthians. (1 Cor. 16:19.) Not long after, ... he went from Ephesus into Macedonia, and after "he had gone over those parts," proceeded from thence on his second visit into Greece; during which visit, or rather at the conclusion of it, this epistle was written. ... We have therefore the time of St. Paul's residence at Ephesus, after he had written to the Corinthians; the time taken up by his progress through Macedonia; and his three months' abode in Greece: we have the sum of these three periods allowed for Aquila and Priscilla going back to Rome, so as to be there when the epistle was written. Now what this leads us to observe, is the danger of scattering names and circumstances in writings like the present; how implicated they often are with dates and places; and that nothing but truth can preserve consistency. Had the notes of time in this epistle fixed the writing of it to any date, prior to St. Paul's first residence at Corinth, the salutation of Aquila and Priscilla would have contradicted the history; because it would have been prior to his acquaintance with these persons. If the notes of time had fixed it during that residence at Corinth; during his journey to Jerusalem when he first returned out of Greece; or during his progress through the Lesser Asia, upon which he proceeded to Antioch; an equal contradiction would have been incurred: because it appears, (Acts 18:2-26.) that during all this time, they were either with St. Paul, or abiding at Ephesus. Lastly, had the notes of time in this epistle, which we have seen to be perfectly incidental, compared with the notes of time in the first epistle to the Corinthians, fixed this epistle to be either contemporary with that, or prior to it, a similar contradiction would have ensued; first, because, when the epistle to the Corinthians was written, Aquila and Priscilla were along with St. Paul; (1 Cor. 16:19.) and because, secondly, the history does not allow us to suppose, that between the time of their becoming acquainted with him, and the writing of that epistle, ... they could have gone back to Rome, so as to have been saluted in an epistle to that city; and then

'have come to St. Paul at Ephesus, so as to be 'joined with him, in saluting the church at 'Corinth. As it is, all things are consistent.' Paley.—The author has transcribed this passage, chiefly to give the less learned reader an idea and a specimen of the manner, in which able critics can, almost in all cases, detect literary forgeries, and establish the authenticity of ancient writings. This is peculiarly needful, in an age of bold infidelity; in which the most confident assertions are made, and suppositions advanced, without the shadow of proof: as if a literary forgery were attended with little difficulty, or danger of detection; when in fact it is nearly the most difficult thing, which can possibly be attempted, and scarcely ever escapes detection.—'St. Paul's contention at Corinth was with unbelieving 'Jews, who at first "opposed and blasphemed," and afterwards "with one accord raised an 'insurrection against him." Aquila and Priscilla adhered, we may conclude, to St. Paul, 'throughout this whole contest. (Acts 18:) ... 'It is highly probable, they should be involved 'in the dangers and persecutions, which St. Paul underwent from the Jews;" ... as they, 'though Jews, were assisting to him, in preaching to the Gentiles at Corinth. They had 'taken a decided part, in the great controversy 'of that day, the admission of the Gentiles to a 'parity of religious situation with the Jews. 'For this conduct alone, ... they may seem to 'have been entitled to thanks, from the church- 'es of the Gentiles.' Paley.

Note.—The apostle also desired to be remembered with the same expressions of affection to Epenetus; for the words rendered "greet" and "salute," are the same in the original (3). He was peculiarly beloved by the apostle, having been his first convert in Achaia, and the earnest of his subsequent usefulness. Perhaps he was the first of the household of Stephanus, who embraced the gospel. (1 Cor. 14:15.)

Note.—It is not known what Mary this was (6); or in what respect she had "bestowed much labor" on the apostle and his friends; but she had, in some proper manner, been very active in providing for their support and comfort. Andronicus and Junia, being Jews, and of the same tribe and family with St. Paul, had on some occasion been imprisoned with him for the sake of the gospel. They had, probably, been converted on the day of Pentecost, or soon after; and were well known and esteemed by the other apostles, even while Paul had been a persecutor: as they "were in Christ," that is, believers, before the apostle was; (Marg. Ref. t. x;) and consequently had then been the objects of his scorn and enmity. (Note, 1 John 3:13—15.) Of the persons who are next mentioned, nothing certain is known. Apelles had approved himself to be a true believer, by his exemplary, zealous conduct. Probably, Aristobulus was not a Christian; but he had several in his household, of whom the apostle had some knowledge. Narcissus is supposed to have been a very powerful and wicked man, of whom many things are recorded in the Roman histories: yet he too had believers in his family, probably among his numerous slaves! Rufus seems to have been the son of Simon the Cyrenian; and his mother had showed such attention to Paul, that he deemed her deserving from him of the honor and respect due to a parent. (Marg. Ref. d—f.—Mark 15:21.—Note, John 19:25—27.)—It is remarkable, that the apostle, amidst all his engagements, should be so well acquainted with the names and characters of many Christians, residing in a city which he had never visited. Most of them, indeed, were such as he had previously been acquainted with; and they formed but a small part of the believers at Rome. Yet this shows his indefatigable diligence, and his attention to every thing relative to the churches of the Gentiles. Xenophon states it as peculiarly admirable in Cyrus, that he so knew all the officers of his numerous army, that, in giving his orders, he addressed each of them by name; and that he made it his study, to be able to do this.—It may also be observed, that the apostle never mentioned the name of Peter, which he doubtless would have done, had Peter then resided at Rome: this powerfully militates against all the traditions of antiquity respecting Peter, on which so enormous a fabric of usurpation and superstition has been erected.—In Christ. (7) Notes, 8:1,2. Is. 45:15—17,23—25. John 6:52—58. 15:2—5. 17:20—23. 1 Cor. 1:26—31. 2 Cor. 5:17. 12:1—6. 1 John 5:20,21.

Note.—An holy kiss.] Marg. Ref. i.—This expression of spiritual affection, to which the apostle exhorted them, in order to show that his epistle had produced its intended effect in promoting mutual love among them, has been supposed to have been used by men and women separately: yet, as it seems afterwards to have been laid aside, because of abuse or slander, that opinion perhaps is groundless, and rather the effect of modern ideas of propriety, resulting from licentious refinement, than suited to the pure simplicity of those primitive times.—The apostle further informed them, that the several churches of Christ, which he had visited, desired to express their affectionate regard to them.

20 And <sup>y</sup> the God of peace <sup>z</sup> shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly. <sup>a</sup> The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. Amen.

Note.—The apostle wrote from the fullness of his heart: and therefore, when he seemed to be concluding, his overflowing love induced him to begin again; as a further topic occurred to his mind. Thus he here interrupted his subject, that he might warn the Christians at Rome, to “note” and carefully guard against the persons, whose conduct, doctrine, or insinuations tended to make divisions in the church, or to stumble or mislead inquirers: and to avoid them, as they would persons, who were infected with some contagious disease. (Marg. Ref. l—o.) For, whatever they professed, they “did not serve Christ,” or seek his glory in what they did; but they rather sought the indulgence of their appetites; and advanced, or zealously contended for, their peculiar opinions, in order to support themselves, and live in plenty, without labor. (Marg. Ref. p, q—Notes, Phil. 3:17—19. 2 Pet. 2:10—19.) Thus, by their benevolent and flattering language, and plausible harangues, they imposed upon the judgment, and insinuated themselves into the affections, of those persons, who were favorably disposed to hear the gospel, but were unsuspecting and undiscerning. (Marg. Ref. r.) Men of this character had done great mischief at Corinth, whence this epistle is supposed to have been written: (Notes, 2 Cor. 11:1—6,13—15.) and he feared lest they should do the same at Rome. The apostle was the more earnest, to caution the Romans against such artful deceivers; because their unreserved “obedience” to the will of Christ was every where spoken of, with great approbation. He was therefore much rejoiced at this good report of them, and desired that it might prevail still more: yet he would have them to be obedient from an established judgment, as well as from a proper disposition of heart: he greatly desired that they might “be wise” and prudent in every good work; and simple and inexperienced only concerning evil, and unacquainted with its painful effects; and thus be harmless and inoffensive. (Marg. Ref. r—x.—Notes, Matt. 10:16—18. 1 Cor. 14:20—25.) He knew that Satan, who was permitted to bruise the heel of the Seed of the woman, would annoy them to the uttermost; but their reconciled God, the Author of inward and outward peace, would “shortly bruise” that enemy, and all his

23 Gaius mine host, and of the whole church, saluteth you. Erastus the chamberlain of the city saluteth you, and Quartus a brother.

Note.—(Marg. Ref.—Notes, Acts 13:1—3. 16:1—3. 17:5—9. 20:4.)—The apostle, not being an expert writer in the Greek language, generally employed an amanuensis. Tertius, who wrote this epistle, has been supposed to be the same person as Silas, or Silvanus; because Silas in Hebrew signifies the Third, as Tertius does in Latin; but this is uncertain, and not very probable.—Gaius perhaps was the same person, to whom John addressed his third epistle. (Preface, 3 John.) Being a man of affluence, he hospitably entertained Paul and his company; and he was so liberal in services of this kind, that he might be called "the host of the whole church." Erastus, as the steward, or treasurer, of Corinth, must have been a person of considerable rank, who had embraced the gospel.

25 ¶ Now to him that is of power to establish you according to my gospel, and the preaching of Jesus Christ, according to the revelation of the mystery, which was kept secret since the world began,

26 But now is made manifest, and by the scriptures of the prophets, according to the commandment of the everlasting God, made known to all nations by the obedience of faith;

27 To God only wise be glory through Jesus Christ for ever. Amen.

Note.—The apostle at length concluded the epistle, with ascribing glory to God in such a manner as to direct the faith and dependence of those whom he addressed, to be placed entirely on him. He was aware that nothing, but the almighty power of God, could preserve them from the fatal assaults of their subtle and potent enemies. But God was able to establish them in the faith, hope, and obedience of the gospel, which had been preached to them; for this accorded to the doctrine of Christ, respecting the salvation of sinners, and the calling of the Gentiles, preached by him in other churches. (Marg. Ref. n, o.) This great mystery had been concealed from mankind in general, since the beginning, and had only been in part revealed to the Jews: but at length it had been openly manifested, according to the writings of the ancient prophets, and by the accomplishment of them; and by the preaching of the gospel, according to the commandment of the eternal God, to his apostles and evangelists: that it might be made known to the nations, in order to deliver them from their idolatries and iniquities, and lead them to "the obedience of faith." (Marg. Ref. p—x.—Notes, 1:1—4. Matt. 13:16,17,34,35. 1 Cor. 2:6—13. Eph. 1:9—12. 3:1—12. Tit. 1:1—4.) To this God of infinite wisdom and knowledge, from whom all wisdom originates, all glory and worship ought to be rendered for ever, through his son Jesus Christ.—By "the only wise God" we must understand the Deity, without respect to the distinction of Persons; or the Father, without excluding the Son or the Holy Spirit; who in many scriptures are shown to be coequal with the Father, in all divine perfections. But as the Godhead is revealed to us, in and by the incarnate Word,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16.

True religion teaches men humbly and frankly to acknowledge their obligations, even to those who in many respects are their inferiors; and “it becometh saints,” to receive and be helpful to each other for the Lord’s sake, as they have opportunity, and to requite the kindness which has been shown to any of their brethren. Indeed the whole church is under obligations to those, who venture their lives, or lay themselves out, to preserve or assist the useful servants of Christ. If an apostle so kindly remembered each of those, who had “bestowed labor upon him;” much more will the Lord remember all the services, which have been performed from love to him and the gospel. (Notes, Matt. 10:40—42. 25:34—40. Heb. 6:9,10.)—Seniority in faith gives a real precedence; and the bonds of grace are nearer than those of nature.—Christ is as much present in the family-worship of those, who meet in his name as in the more public assemblies of his saints. Believers are often found in those families, of which the principals are unconverted; and they should perform their several relative duties, with cheerfulness and a deference to their superiors, though strangers to the grace of God; (Notes, 1 Tim. 6:1—5. 1 Pet. 2:18—25.) nor are they on account of their low condition less regarded or beloved by the Lord, or by his faithful and zealous ministers.

V. 17—27.

In order to maintain our communion with the Lord and with his saints uninterrupted; those persons must be marked with decided disapprobation, and avoided, who aim to prejudice believers against each other, to draw them off from faithful pastors, or to seduce them into strange doctrines, contrary to the simple truths of God’s word. For, notwithstanding their zeal and confidence, as if they alone were the servants of Christ, they evidently do not belong to our “Prince of peace;” but are the slaves of their selfish interests, sensual appetites, or ambition. By their apparent affection and compassion, and by their well-worded declamations, they deceive many hopeful injudicious persons; and few are absolutely secured from their plausible delusions. While therefore, we give Christians merited commendation for their obedience hitherto; we should use every proper means to render them “wise to that which is good,” and to keep them inexperienced “in that which is evil;” as well as to encourage them and ourselves with the assurance, that “the God of peace will bruise Satan under our feet shortly.”—Every expression of the most endeared affection should be used among believers, but in the most pure and holy manner.—Those who honor Christ by showing kindness to his people, will be honored by him, having their names written in the book of life.—True religion does not require men to quit public stations; when they can fill them to the glory of God, and the benefit of his church.—Trusting in the power of God, to establish us in the faith and hope of the gospel; thankfully receiving the revelation of the mystery, which was so long kept secret from mankind; endeavoring to make known the gospel “according to the scriptures of the prophets, and the commandment of the everlasting God,” in all parts of the world; and to help all who by scriptural means attempt this, to the utmost of our ability, and with our unceasing prayers; remembering that we are called to the “obedience of faith,” and that every degree of true wisdom is from the “only wise God;” we should endeavor, by word and deed, to render glory to him through Jesus Christ; that so “the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ may be with us forever. Amen.”

THE

CORINTHIANS.

THE narrative of the apostle’s successful preaching at Corinth, has been considered. (Notes, Acts 18:1—17.) But very soon after he left the church which he founded there, other teachers came thither, who made great pretensions to eloquence, wisdom, and knowledge of Christian liberty; and thus undermined his influence, and the credit of his ministry. By these means, the Corinthians were divided into parties, engaged in eager disputes, and seduced into various irregularities in practice, and errors in doctrine.—“It appears, that this letter to the Corinthians was written by St. Paul, in answer to one which he had received from them, (7:1.) and that the seventh, and some of the following chapters, are taken up in resolving certain

'doubts, and regulating certain points of order, concerning which the Corinthians had... consulted him. ... Though ... they had written to St. Paul, requesting his answer and directions, 'in these points; they had not said one syllable about the enormities and disorders which had crept in among them; and in the blame of which they all shared; but his information concerning these irregularities had come round to him from other quarters, ... by more private intelligence.' Paley. The epistle was therefore written, not only as an answer to the inquiries of the Corinthians by letter; but in order to oppose, and if it could be terminate, the various corruptions, in doctrine and practice, which prevailed, to subvert the influence of the false teachers, and to re-establish the apostle's own authority in that church. By general truths, he, with great address and prudence, made way for a more direct and particular opposition to the several gross irregularities and dangerous mistakes, into which they had been seduced. He stated the truth and will of God in various particulars, with great energy of argument and animation of style; he satisfactorily resolved the several questions which had been proposed to him; he, with great tenderness and wisdom, intermixed exhortations and directions with his other subjects; and he concluded with affectionate and pathetic prayers for them.— Though this epistle is not so systematic as that to the Romans, it is replete with important instruction, and contains the fullest and most interesting declaration and demonstration of the resurrection of believers, in consequence of the resurrection of their Lord, which is any where to be found. (Notes, 15.)—It is most evident, that the epistle was written by the apostle, when residing at or near Ephesus, and some time before he left that city. (Note, 16:5—9.)—Learned men generally calculate, that it was written about A. D. 55, 56, or 57.— 'In the ninth year of Claudius, saith Orosius, in the tenth say others, in the twelfth says Dr. Pearson, the Jews were banished from Rome; and St. Paul coming to Corinth, finds Aquila and Priscilla newly come from thence to Corinth on that occasion.' (Acts 18:2.) He stays there a year and a half (11); ... at Ephesus three years, (Acts 20:31.) and at the close of these three years, he writes this epistle. ... If with Dr. Pearson, you begin them only at the twelfth of Claudius, they will end in the third of Nero, A. D. 57.' Whitby. But this learned writer has allowed no time for the apostle's voyage, and journey to Jerusalem, and his progress through the churches of Syria, Galatia, and other parts of Asia Minor; and the same oversight has been fallen into by most of those, whom the author has had the opportunity of consulting, who date the epistle so early.—A. D. 54. Paul at Corinth, meets with Aquila and Priscilla. ... A. D. 56. Paul departs from Corinth, and passeth to Ephesus; thence he sets out towards Jerusalem, ... he lands at Cæsarea, goes down to Antioch, and comes into the regions of Galatia and Phrygia, confirming the disciples in all these places.—A. D. 57. Paul returns to Ephesus. ... A. D. 60. About this time a schism ariseth in the church at Corinth, which causeth Paul, (now in or about Ephesus,) to write his First Epistle to the Corinthians.' Index to the Quarto Oxford Bible, 1794. The person who compiled this index, seems to place the writing of the epistle subsequent to the tumult at Ephesus, which it certainly was not. (Notes, 16:5—9. 2 Cor. 1:8—11.) It could not, however, be written long before the apostle left Ephesus; and probably the index above quoted does not allow too much time, for the apostle's progress from Jerusalem to Ephesus. (Notes, Acts 18:18—23. 19:8—12.) This computation, therefore, the author has fixed on, as more satisfactory than any other which he has seen.—The epistle contains no express prophecies; but nothing can exceed the decided claim to divine inspiration, which the writer advances. (Notes, 2:6—13.) He either therefore claimed what he was not entitled to; or his epistles are not only genuine and authentic, but divinely inspired. (Preface to the Epistles.)

CHAP. I.

The apostle salutes the church at Corinth, 1—3; thanks God for the grace and gifts conferred on the Christians residing there, 4—7; and expresses his confidence respecting their salvation, 8—10. He exhorts them to unity, and reproves their dissensions, 10—16. "The preaching of the cross is foolishness to them that perish, but the power and wisdom of God," to the salvation of believers, 17—25. To exclude boasting, God has not called the wise, the mighty, or the noble; but the foolish, the weak, and those whom man despises, 26—29. Christ is "made of God," to those who are in him, "Wisdom, and Righteousness, and Sanctification, and Redemption," that we may glory in the Lord alone, 30, 31.

Note.—(Notes, Rom. 1:1—4. Gal. 1:1, 2.) There was a party at Corinth, who depreciated St. Paul's ministry, and questioned his apostolical authority: it was therefore proper for him to begin his epistle with an express declaration, that he was called, "through the will of God" to that high office in the church: and it was conciliatory and condescending, to join Sosthenes with him, in this salutation and address; as he meant to reprove many evils, which had crept in among the Corinthians. (Marg. Ref. h—d.) It is probable, that Sosthenes was one of those, who, having been appointed to the ministry, accompanied Paul in his travels.

(Note, Acts 15:12-17.) The apostle addressed "the church of God," or the collective body of Christians, at Corinth, as "sanctified in Christ," which some explain of their having been separated, or set apart for God, in his eternal purpose, as "chosen in Christ to be saints," or holy persons; others, of their being actually sanctified by the communication of his Spirit. (Marg. Ref. e-h.)—With them he also joined "all that in every place called upon the name of the Lord Jesus;" who was equally the Lord of the apostle, of Sosthenes, and of every believer. It is probable, that the apostle immediately referred to the other churches in Achaia. The passage, however, shows how inseparable the invocation of Christ was from the profession of Christianity in those days. (Marg. Ref. i, k.—Notes, Acts 2:14-21. 9:10-14. Rom. 10:5-11.) Some would indeed render it, "those, who are called by the name of the Lord Jesus;" but it is evidently inconsistent with the proper construction of the Greek language, thus to render it; and this interpretation, we may confidently assert, would never have been adopted, if the previous opposition of men's minds to the divine adoration of Christ, had not induced them to have recourse to it: though it must be allowed that some have favored it, who by no means denied the Deity of Christ.—To them that are sanctified, &c. (2) To explain the terms "sanctified" and "saints," as implying no more than the profession of Christianity, and including all nominal Christians, as many learned men do, would enervate the language of the apostle, and confound the distinction between the form and the power of godliness, which it is his grand object to maintain. No doubt there were unconverted persons, in the several churches, even in those days: but the apostles addressed their epistles to the collective body, according to their profession; thus teaching them what that profession implied: but if they were not truly saints, they were no more intended, than if they had not been called Christians. The arguments by which these learned writers support their opinion, would equally prove, that the worst persons in the church at Corinth, were indeed "the temple of the Holy Spirit," the "temple of the living God," and entitled to all spiritual and eternal blessings, equally with true believers. (3:16. 6:11,19. 2 Cor. 6:16.)—Even here from the beginning he lays the foundation of his future reasoning: "for if the Corinthians, and all other believers, were called by one God, and sanctified in one Christ; if they all had, and owned, the same Lord; whence did the dissensions arise and get strength among them, as if Christ was divided?" Beza.

That these words ought not to be rendered passively, ... is evident from the Septuagint, who still translate the phrase, ἐπικαλεσθησονται, ("he shall call on the name,") which is active, by επικαλυσεται επ' ονοματι Θεου, or επ' ονοματι Κυριου. (*Gen. 4:26. 12:8. 13:4. ... Now before this time, we find not only Stephen calling on this name, and saying, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit;" and St. Paul bid "to wash away his sins, calling on the name of the Lord;" ... but Ananias speaks to the Lord Jesus of St. Paul, "He hath authority from the high priest, to bind all that call on thy name;" and of him it is said, "He destroyed them that called on this name in Jerusalem."—Dr. Hammond, who here translates this phrase passively, doth elsewhere translate it actively, the context forcing him so to do. So Rom. 10:13. "Whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord;" that is, pray and adhere to Christ. ... And Acts 9:14. "He hath authority to bind all that call upon thy name;" that is, saith he, that publicly own the worship of Christ." Whitby.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—(Notes, Phil. 1:3—8.) Before the apostle entered on the immediate subject of his epistle, he endeavored to conciliate the affections of the Corinthians, by calling to their recollection the benefits which they had derived from his ministry. He continually thanked God on their account, for having bestowed his grace upon them, “through Jesus Christ;” by which they had been turned from idolatry, to the faith of the gospel and the worship of God. (Marg. Ref. m, n.—Note, Rom. 1:8—12.) They had also been “enriched by him” with all spiritual gifts, and miraculously enabled to speak in divers languages, and filled with abundant knowledge of divine things, and a ready elocution in speaking of them. As the testimony of Christ had been confirmed among them, by the miracles of the apostle; they too had been enabled to work miracles after they had embraced it: so that they had come behind no other church in any spiritual gift, before the new teachers were known among them. (Marg. Ref. o—t.—Note, Gal. 3:1—5.) Thus, they were preparing themselves and each other, as those who waited for the coming of Christ their Lord and Judge; (Marg. Ref. u.—Notes, Matt. 25:14—30. Luke 19:11—27. 1 Thes. 1:9, 10. Heb. 9:27, 28.) By the continued supplies of his grace he would “confirm them to the end” of their course, in the faith and hope of the gospel; that they might be preserved blameless, in their conduct through life; and stand completely justified and sanctified in the day of judgment. (Notes, Phil. 1:9—11. 1 Thes. 5:23—28. Jude 22—25.) This would certainly be the case, if they were what they professed and appeared to be: seeing “God is faithful” to his promises and covenant, which he ratified with them personally, when he effectually called them to be partakers of Christ and all his blessings, and to a life of communion with him. The apostle indeed afterwards intimated his doubts of some of the Corinthians; yet he here addressed them, as being, in the judgment of charity, what they professed to be.—Out of the abundance of his heart he repeats the words, “Our Lord Jesus Christ,” so often, that there is a danger of those readers, whose hearts are strangers to the holy affection which occupied that of the apostle, being disgusted with the repetition.—Blameless, &c, (8) ‘He calls them ‘blameless, not whom none had ever blamed; but those whom none could justly blame; that is, those who are in Christ Jesus. (Rom. 8:1, 33.)’ Beza. Certainly neither spotless innocent, nor sinless perfection, nor such a tenor of conduct from their first profession of Christianity, as was wholly unblameable, could be meant: for the apostle blames many things afterwards, which were very general among them; yet their renewal to holiness seems intended, and their conduct as harmless and blameless, at least equally with their justification. (Marg. Ref. x, y.—Notes, Eph. 5:22—27. Col. 1:21—23.) ‘God will make good his promise, ... if you do ‘not fail yourselves.’ Hammond. It seems, that the system, which this learned writer adopts, cannot be maintained, without “adding to the word” of God; for he and his coadjutors frequently insert a clause of this kind, as if the inspired writers had forgotten it, and had expressed themselves incautiously! In fact, it is an interpolation, and as such must be rejected. All professed Christians indeed, at Corinth, would not be “kept by the power of God, through faith, unto salvation;” for some were not true believers; yet all those whom the apostle especially addressed, would thus persevere; namely, “the saints,” even those whom God had “called to the fellowship of his Son Jesus Christ.” (Notes, Rom. 8:28—39.)

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—After this conciliatory introduction, the apostle proceeded to the subject, on which he particularly wrote to the Corinthians; and to point out that leading evil, which gave rise to the other evils that he meant to reprove. He besought and exhorted them, by the name, the honor, and the authority of Christ, to cease from “murmurings and disputings;” that they might all join in the same language of faith; avoid all schisms, contentions, or disunion of heart; and be “perfectly joined together in the same mind and in the same judgment,” as the different members are compacted into one body.—Considering the different capacities, educations, habits, and prejudices of mankind, it seems impossible to avoid all difference of opinion: but it is equally true that fallen men will never on earth “love God with all their heart,” and “their neighbors as themselves;” yet the rule and exhortation must not be changed on that account. As we have one rule, and one standard of truth, and one Spirit to be our Teacher; so, in proportion to our humility, simplicity, and diligence, we come to be of “one mind and judgment,” in the great concerns of religion: and were we perfect in these things, we should also be perfectly united in sentiment and affection. (Note, Jer. 32:39—41.) This will be the case in heaven; and it will at length be so in a great degree on earth. The nearer we come to it, the more we approximate to perfection: all our divisions arise from a sinful cause, which must not be excused; but while this cause subsists, we should endeavor to hear with each other in respect of it, and so to “keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace.” (Marg. Ref. d—f.—Notes, Eph. 4:1—6. Phil. 1:27—30. 2:1—4.) Yet we ought continually to pray for the more abundant pouring out of the Spirit of truth and love, on ourselves and all our fellow Christians, that we may be “perfectly joined together in the same mind and in the same judgment.”—The apostle gave the Christians at Corinth this seasonable admonition; because he had been informed by those, on whom he could depend, and whom he did not hesitate to mention, that the church in that city was troubled with contentions. They were in a divided state; and he might say, that every one of them was attached to some particular teacher, in opposition to all others. As if one should profess himself to belong to Paul’s company; another, to that of the eloquent Apollos; another to Peter the great apostle of the circumcision; and as if others professed themselves the disciples of Christ alone, to excuse their disregard for all his ministers! (Marg. Ref. g—m.)—It has been thought, with probability, that the apostle does not mention these names, as really the heads of the parties into which the Corinthians had divided: but in order more emphatically to mark the evil of the thing itself, and the absurdity of dividing the church, out of a disposition inordinately to honor some particular teacher; or to despise faithful ministers, under pretence of honoring Christ. However respectable the names might be, which were thus used, the thing was indefensible; but it would give less umbrage for him to mention himself, Apollos, and Cephas, than expressly to name the false teachers, who were the authors of the discord. (Note, 2 Cor. 11:13—15.) He therefore demanded of the Corinthians, whether Christ and his salvation, or his mystical body, could be thus divided, and one part set in opposition to another? Had Paul, or had any of their other teachers, acquired a right to them, by *aton*ing for their sins on the cross? Or had any of them been baptized in the name of Paul, as his disciples, who were engaged in all things, without reserve, to be devoted to him and honor him? (Marg. Ref. n—p.—Notes, Matt. 28:19,20. 2 Cor. 5:13—16.) As things had turned out, he was thankful, that he had baptized so few of them; lest his opponents should have averred that he “baptized them in his own name.” He could recollect but a few, whom he had baptized; nor was it necessary that he should be immediately inspired with the remembrance of so immaterial a fact: the rest had been baptized by others, according to the appointment of Christ, without any mention of the apostle’s name in it, as they very well knew. (Marg. Ref. q—u.) assigns entirely subverts their imaginations. Christ did not send his apostle to baptize men in his name; (which outward form might be administered, with equal validity, by those of inferior station and endowments;) but to preach the gospel, which was a far more important and difficult service; so that he left others to baptize those who embraced the truth. (Notes, John 4: 1—4, v. 2. Acts 10:44—48, v. 48.) Some indeed of the Corinthians might think, that he was not so competent to preach the gospel, as this declaration seemed to imply: and he readily allowed, that he had not used the "wisdom of words," or those plausible reasonings, rhetorical flourishes, and arts of oratory, which they admired, and by which some teachers fascinated them. For "Christ sent him" to deliver an important message, in plain language: and he was aware that these decorations, instead of giving efficacy to his doctrine, would degrade it, and even "render the cross of Christ of none effect." These studied arts of pleasing would have enervated the solemn, affecting subject, and obscured its glory. If indeed the preacher did not seek his own honor, in the display of these endowments; he would at least excite men's attention to him, and admiration of him, rather than of his message or his Lord; and the Holy Spirit would not accompany the word by his new-creating power, when the credit would be given to the instrument, rather than to the Agent. (Marg. Ref. x—z.—Notes, 2:3—5. Ex. 4:10—12. 2 Cor. 4:7. 10:7—11.)

—In fact, the preaching of salvation for lost sinners, by the ignominious and agonizing crucifixion of the incarnate Son of God, was "foolishness" to all those who continued in the way to destruction. The sensual, the covetous, and the ambitious perceived, that it was incompatible with their favorite pursuits; the Pharisee and the moralist exclaimed against it, as needless, and tending to licentiousness. The Scribe, the Sadducee, and the heathen philosopher, each had his reasons for deriding and reviling it; and the antinomian would foolishly suppose that Christ was crucified, to procure for him the license of gratifying his evil propensities. But those who were the saved, by true faith, knew this despised doctrine to be the constituted and most suitable means, by which the power of God effectually wrought, in pulling down the kingdom of Satan, and converting sinners to himself. (Marg. Ref. a—d.—Notes, 20—24. Rom. 1:13—16. 2 Cor. 10:1—6.) And, as to the opinion of the wise men of the world, God had declared that he would destroy their wisdom, and bring it to nothing. (Marg. Ref. c.—Notes, 3:18—23. Job 5:12—16. Is. 29:13—16. 44:25—28.)—"Why did the Holy Spirit choose to deliver such important truths, in the 'barbarous idiom of a few obscure Galileans?' Campbell. The apostle Paul was not one of these 'obscure Galileans;' but is not this highly improper language, concerning inspired writers, who received the gift of tongues immediately from the Holy Spirit? They did not learn barbarous Greek, as Galilean fishermen. They made no claim to elegance; but certainly precision, and perspicuity, and simplicity, are found in their writings, in no common degree. —To baptize. (17) Whence did the almost universally prevailing opinion originate, that the administration of sacraments is the peculiar and highest office of the Christian ministry, above even that of preaching the gospel? Perhaps the reader has never thought of asking this question. I have, however, no hesitation in answering. From popery, in its incipient or more matured state: to change by the opus operatum, which the priest alone can perform aright, 'a child of the devil,' into 'a child of God,' which must be the case if baptism be regeneration, or inseparable from it; and to change, in the same way, a piece of bread, into the body, soul, and divine nature of Christ, and render it an object of adoration, derives a far higher dignity to the priesthood, than even apostolical preaching can do. I will destroy. (19) From the LXX, only changing απονομι, for αθετησω. 20 Where <sup>r</sup>is the wise? where is the scribe? where is the disputer of this world? <sup>s</sup> hath not God made foolish the wisdom of this world?

24 But unto them which are <sup>q</sup>called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ <sup>r</sup>the power of God, and <sup>s</sup>the wisdom of God.

Note.—(Note, Is. 33:17—19.) The philosophers, scribes, and disputers of the world, were in general employed in confuting each other's systems: they scarcely agreed in any thing, except in rejecting and despising the gospel: and it was evident that their wisdom and learning had been of little use to mankind. What indeed had they achieved? What traces of their success, in meliorating the state of the world, could be discovered? Could it be denied, that God had exposed the folly of this kind of wisdom, in the most conspicuous manner? In his infinite wisdom, he had left a great part of the world to follow the dictates of their own boasted reason: and the event had demonstrated, that the wisdom of fallen man was incompetent to find out or retain the knowledge of God his Creator; so that idolatry, atheism, or skepticism, connected with the most extreme wickedness, was the universal effect. (Marg. Ref. f—i.—Notes, Matt. 11:25,26. Rom. 1:21—32.) When this experiment had been sufficiently tried; "it pleased God" to send forth his apostles and evangelists, to preach that doctrine, which was derided as "foolishness;" and they delivered their message in the most artless and unadorned manner: yet, behold, most wonderful effects followed! Immense multitudes believed the report, were saved from idolatry and iniquities, and became the worshippers and servants of the living God! (Notes, 1 Thes. 1:5—10.) The Jewish scribes indeed, not satisfied with all the demonstrations, from miracles and prophecies, that Jesus was the Messiah, as not savoring his spiritual salvation, demanded "a sign from heaven," and waited for a Messiah, who should "come with outward observation;" (Marg. Ref. l.—Notes, Matt. 16:1—4. Luke 17:20—23.) and the Greeks required a doctrine adapted to their philosophy, and supported by reasonings and speculations like that of their noted leaders. But the servants of God "preached Christ crucified;" this was the grand peculiarity of their doctrine, the centre of their instructions, and the topic on which they delighted to expatiate, and by motives deduced from it, they enforced all their exhortations. This doctrine of a crucified Messiah; this testimony, that he, who had been put to death by the rulers of the Jews, as "a deceiver," was their long expected Deliverer and King, to whom all subjection was due, and from whom all blessings were to be expected, was "a stumbling-stone to the Jews," who took offence at it, and persisted in unbelief: while the philosophizing Greeks derided, as the excess of folly, the idea that a Jew, and one whom that despised nation had crucified with ignominy, should be honored as the Governor and Judge of all mankind, trusted as the only Saviour from everlasting misery, and even adored as the infinite and almighty God. (Marg. Ref. m—p.) But all those, whether Jews or Gentiles, who were "called according to his purpose," (Notes, Rom. 8:28—31. 9:24—29.) not only saw the power of God, in the miracles by which the gospel was confirmed in the resurrection of Christ, and in the accomplishment of ancient prophecies; and his wisdom in the glorious plan of redemption, as harmoniously honoring all the divine perfections and magnifying the divine law: but they experienced Christ to be "the Power of God and the Wisdom of God," to deliver them from the bondage of sin, and to make them "wise unto salvation;" and they clearly discerned that he and his gospel were the grand medium by which the power and wisdom of God were displayed; in the subversion of Satan's kingdom of idolatry and sin, and in confounding all the subtle devices of him and his servants. (Marg. Ref. q—s.—Notes, Eph. 3:9—12. 1 John 5:9,10,19—21.)

25 Because 'the foolishness of God is wiser than men; and the weakness of God is stronger than men. [Practical Observations.]

Note.—Those doctrines and dispensations of God, which proud and presumptuous men decry as foolish and weak, are immensely superior in wisdom, and more efficacious than all which man ever could devise or attempt for the same or similar purposes. Thus the doctrine of salvation by faith in a crucified Jew, which appeared to the carnal mind a foolish device; and the preaching of it, by unlearned and obscure persons, which appeared a weak expedient; had, by the power of God accompanying it, done more, in a few years, towards making men wise and holy, than all the learning and sagacity of Jewish Scribes and Pagan philosophers, or the power of armed legislators, had ever been able to effect, or ever would have effected to the end of time. (Marg. Ref.—P. O. Josh. 6:1—14. Judg. 7:16—25.)

Note.—The persons, who had been converted to Christianity, and then sent forth to preach the gospel, were a living demonstration of what the apostle inculcated. This the Corinthians might see for themselves: for, as the gospel had not been preached to them “with wisdom of words,” or with a display of learning and philosophy; but very few of the sages, politicians, mighty princes, or warriors, or of the noble and honorable of the earth, had embraced it. They had perhaps heard a few instances of this kind, in which the omnipotence of divine grace had been displayed. (Notes, Matt. 19: 23—26. Jam. 2:5—7.) The persons, however, whom God had employed in preaching the gospel, seem especially intended; and the words, “are called,” which seem to favor the other interpretation, are not in the original. (Marg. Ref. v, x.—Notes, Ps. 8:2. Matt. 11:25, 26. 21:14—16. 2 Cor. 4:7. P. O. 7—12.) The apostles, and evangelists, and other ministers, whom God had chosen to publish his salvation to mankind, were not in general called to that service from the schools of the learned, from the courts of princes, or from noble families and eminent stations. On the contrary, they were men whom the world counted “foolish,” because not remarkable for eminent talents, and because destitute of human learning: and indeed, such persons were selected for this purpose, that by them God might confound the proud reasonings and scornful objections of heathen philosophers and Jewish Rabbies. (Marg. Ref. y.—Notes, Matt. 4:18—22. P. O. 12—25. Note, Acts 4: 13—22.) He had chosen “the weak things of the world,” namely, men of low birth and mean circumstances, unarmed, unlettered fishermen, tent-makers, and others, destitute of authority, power, and influence, not previously renowned for courage and vigor of mind; but gentle and mild in their deportment: that, having endued them with heavenly wisdom and strength, and enabled them to confirm their testimony by stupendous miracles; he might by their holy lives and heroic constancy, their patient sufferings and successful labors, put to shame and confound the mighty of the earth. God had even chosen “the base things of the world,” even some, who had previously been of immoral characters, and disreputable professions; that being made wise, holy, and useful in the ministry, by his grace and blessing, they might confound and astonish those, who formerly counted them even beneath contempt. (Notes, Matt. 9:9—13.) Nay, he had raised up eminent ministers from among the Gentiles, who, in the proud language and sentiments of the Jews, were considered as scarcely existing, in respect of God and religion; that he might by them confound and shame the Scribes, Pharisees, and unbelieving Jews. (Marg. Ref. z, a.) In short the Lord had ordered every thing, respecting the conversion of sinners, the preachers of the gospel, the plan of redemption, and the way of acceptance, in such a manner, as to give no one of the human species any ground of boasting or “glorying in his presence;” either in respect of abilities, learning, noble birth, privileges, achievements, moral character, or natural good dispositions; or any other distinction, either before or after conversion. (Marg. Ref. b.—Notes, 4:6,7. Rom. 3. 27,28. 2 Cor. 10:17,18.) Why then should the Corinthians so value these endowments in their teachers, when God had evidently poured contempt on them?—Even that distinction, in which alone they might glory, was not in any respect of themselves. By the gratuitous choice and regenerating grace of God, through faith they, sinners of the Gentiles, were “in Christ Jesus,” who, by his appointment and free mercy was “made,” or become, to all believers the whole of salvation. For they being in themselves ignorant, foolish, guilty, polluted, enslaved, and condemned; Christ was constituted to each of them “Wisdom;” that, by his word and Spirit, and from his fulness, and “treasures of wisdom and knowledge,” they might receive that instruction and counsel, which would render them “wise unto salvation,” and fit for every service to which they were called: (Notes, Col. 2:1—4,8—10.) “and Righteousness,” that being justified by his obedience unto death imputed to them, and “made the righteousness of God in him,” they might possess a title to eternal life: (Notes, Rom. 3:21—26, v. 22. 2 Cor. 5:18—21, v. 21.) “and Sanctification,” that, by the power of the Spirit of Christ, they might be at length renewed to his image, and made perfect in holiness, and meetness for their heavenly inheritance: “and Redemption,” that, by his power and grace, being delivered from the bondage of sin and Satan, they might at length be completely rescued from all remains and traces of this hateful slavery, and be saved from the condemnation and all the consequences of sin; till, by the redemption of the body from the grave, “death itself should be swallowed up in everlasting victory.” (Marg. Ref. e—h.) Thus, they who “gloried, might glory in the Lord,” (Jer. 9:23,24.) in his special favor, all-sufficient grace, and inestimable salvation; though in themselves they had nothing to glory in, but every thing to be ashamed of.—Here again the apostle refers to Jesus, “the Lord our Righteousness and Strength,” what the prophet had spoken of JEHOVAH. (Notes, Is. 45:23—25. Jer. 9:23,24. 23:5,6. Rom. 14: 10—12. Gal. 6:11—14, v. 14.)—“They who say, that Christ is made our Righteousness by his righteousness imputed to us, have the same reason to say also, that he is made our Wisdom, by his wisdom imputed to us, &c.” Whitby. There might be some weight in this objection, if this were the only passage of scripture, by which those who hold “imputed righteousness” prove their doctrine; if there were any other passages in the sacred oracles, which even seem to countenance the notion of imputed wisdom, or sanctification, or redemption; and if the nature of the case were not essentially different. Another may pay my debt, and allow me to receive the wages which he has earned, or the reward to which his services entitle him: thus his payment and his labor may be set down to my account, or imputed to me for my adequate advantage: but who can have wisdom, health, or liberty, by imputation? PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

The true “church of God” comprises all those, in every place, who are “sanctified in Christ Jesus, and called to be saints;” who call on him as “God manifest in the flesh,” for all the blessings of salvation; and who acknowledge and obey him as their Lord, and the Lord of all saints, of all men, and of all creatures: and it includes no other persons. In behalf of all such, we should pray continually, for an increase of “grace and peace from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ;” we should “thank God, for the grace bestowed on them by Jesus Christ;” with an especial remembrance of those, with whom we are more immediately connected; and we should rejoice in those gifts and that knowledge, by which “the testimony of Christ is confirmed among them.” But ministers, with a mixture of authority and affection, should remind their flocks, that an account must be given of all their advantages at the coming of Christ, and call on them daily to wait and prepare for that event. He will “confirm” his true disciples “unto the end;” and they may confidently trust in him to “preserve them blameless to that day,” and to “present them faultless, before the presence of his glory, with exceeding joy.” But many appear to be Christians, and are endued with useful gifts, who have not been “called to the fellowship of Christ;” it is therefore highly proper to exhort all who profess the gospel, to prove the reality of their faith, and “the sincerity of their love;” and to “wait for the coming of their Lord,” by watchfulness, diligence, and a careful improvement of their talents.—How striking is the contrast between the language of the apostle in these verses, and that of many modern divines! The name of the Lord Jesus Christ was to him the sweetest melody, or “as ointment poured forth;” (Note, Cant. 1:3.) they seem to fear nothing so much, as a too frequent, or too honorable mention of him! and, whatever repetitions they may fall into, they will be sure to offend no man, by too often enlarging upon his dignity and condescension, his love and atoning sufferings, his character and offices, his righteousness and salvation. (Note, 2:1,2.)

V. 10—16.

Satan has always endeavored to stir up strife

among Christians, as one of his grand devices against the gospel: we should therefore use all our influence to prevail with our brethren by the name, and for the honor of our common Lord, to avoid contests of every kind, and as much as possible to “speak the same thing, and to be perfectly joined together in the same mind and judgment;” and we should persevere in praying for this most desirable harmony, and endeavor to promote it. For it must greatly pain every serious and judicious believer, to see or hear of the divisions which take place, through the spiritual pride, ambition, selfishness, and malignant passions, of turbulent and designing men; and through the prejudices, instability, want of judgment, love of novelty, and eager spirit of some real believers. Thus the church is divided into parties; congregations are distracted by intestine contentions; and men are drawn away from their faithful pastors, to rank themselves under the banners of some confident deceiver, who “privily brings in damnable heresies;” couched in plausible language, propagated under specious pretences, and varnished over by an ingenuity, which might have been far better employed. Thus, professed Christians become ‘the disciples of men;’ and, regardless of the apostle’s exhortations, they still glory in ranking themselves among the followers of this or the other preacher: as if “Christ were divided!” or as if that teacher, whom they extol, while they despise others, had been “crucified for them;” or “they had been baptized into his name;” and “vowed to be ‘his faithful soldiers unto their lives’ end!” We should be very thankful, if we have been preserved from giving sanction or occasion to such disgraceful contests; we should carefully avoid all appearance of seeking our own credit, instead of the glory of Christ; (Note, 2 Cor. 4:5,6.) and pray continually for “the meekness of wisdom,” that we may know how to counteract the pestilent endeavors of the fire-brands of the church, without giving them any handle or plausible pretence against us.

V. 17—25.

Those whom Christ sends to “preach his gospel” are often incapable, and should never be studious, of “that wisdom of words,” which men of education and ingenuity, but of a worldly spirit, admire; nor should the hearers of the gospel look for such worthless decorations of that divine doctrine, which is most beautiful in its native simplicity. Too often “the cross of Christ is rendered of none effect;” through the vain affectation of the preachers, to recommend it by the studied graces of elocution, or the ostentatious parade of learning and philosophy. Thus its edge is blunted, its convincing plainness is obscured, its genuine beauty and glory are tarnished; the preacher has his worthless reward, in human applause or useless popularity. (Note, Matt. 6:1—4.) But the Spirit of God disdains to set his seal to the word thus preached; it proves the mere shadow of a feast, at which the guests are starved; and an amusing display of ingenuity, instead of an assault on “the strong holds” of Satan by the power of divine truth. Indeed all attempts, to make the real gospel palatable to worldly men, must be unsuccessful: it always was, and always will be, “foolishness;” to such as are in the road to destruction: and the only way to render it in-offensive, is to leave out, or but slightly touch on, the offensive parts of it: and this is too commonly done, when preachers study to embellish their doctrine and recommend themselves, by "the wisdom of words, or the excellency of speech." But the true minister of Christ is no "man-pleaser:" he will with "great plainness of speech" deliver his whole message, however it may be derided or reviled; that by it, as a sure touch-stone, men may learn their real state and character. Thus, while to numbers it appears foolish, to "those who are saved" it proves "the power of God." It is his determination to "destroy the wisdom of the wise, and to bring to nothing the understanding of the prudent;" he will not honor carnal weapons, or self-sufficient teachers; he will pour contempt on carnal wisdom; and will abase, either in deep humiliation, or final destruction, all the learned scribes, the wise philosophers, and the eager "disputers of this world." Such persons are indeed commonly found among the despisers or opposers of the doctrine of Christ crucified; but what have they ever done towards rendering the world wise and holy? Or what have they to propose so excellent, as to merit a preference to that gospel which they reject, or even to bear a comparison with it? Undeniable facts evince the folly of this wisdom; and show that, amidst all the displays of the "eternal power and Godhead," with which we are surrounded, human reason, sagacity, and learning know him not, but uniformly lead men to idolatry, impiety, or infidelity: and on the other hand "it hath pleased God," from age to age by "the foolishness of preaching," (the despised doctrine of salvation by faith in a crucified Saviour, God in human nature, "purchasing the church with his own blood," delivered with unadorned simplicity,) to save multitudes, even all that believe, from ignorance, delusion, and vice; and to make them meet for his heavenly kingdom. For the true minister of God insists especially upon this great doctrine, which is no less a stumbling-block to some, and foolishness to others, at present, than it was in the apostle's days: but which is known and experienced to "be the wisdom and power of God" to all, who partake of the high and gracious calling of God in Christ Jesus.

V. 26.—31.

There is scarcely a stronger demonstration of man's depravity, blindness, and folly, than this circumstance; that neither facts nor arguments can repress his arrogance in treating the wisdom of God manifested in the gospel as "foolishness," the power of God as "weakness;" though no human devices or efforts have ever produced effects in the least comparable to those, which have been and are even now wrought by it. Let them then call it folly, enthusiasm, weakness, madness, or what they please: may we show in our lives, that it is a wise, holy, and blessed doctrine; and we shall feel in our hearts that it gives "a peace of God, which passeth all understanding." And though we see, as those before us did, that but "few of the wise, the mighty, the noble of this world" are called to the knowledge of the truth, or employed to promote the cause of righteousness;

yet we may perceive also, that God employs the foolish, weak, despised, and ignoble of this world, to confound the devices, and expose the folly of the wise, to disappoint the designs of the mighty, and to disgrace and bring into contempt "the honorable of the earth;" so that in every thing he takes care, that no flesh should glory in his presence.—But let us not fear, knowing how foolish, guilty, polluted, and enslaved we are in ourselves; for by deep convictions of this kind the Holy Spirit leads poor sinners to believe in Christ, who "of God" and by his special grace "is made to them Wisdom, and Righteousness, and Sanctification, and Redemption;" so that having all in him, they may be satisfied to have nothing as of themselves; and when most covered with shame, and filled with deep remorse and self-abhorrence, they may yet "glory in the Lord and his salvation;" and hope to glorify him on earth, and to be preserved as monuments of his love, to praise and glorify him for ever in his heavenly felicity.

CHAP. II.

The apostle declares, that he had not come among the Corinthians "with excellency of speech and wisdom," but had preached Christ crucified, with plainness and humble diffidence; that their "faith might stand in the power of God" alone, 1—5. The gospel contains the hidden "wisdom of God" in bringing men to glory, which could not be discovered by any human sagacity, 6—8; but God by his Spirit had revealed it, 10—13. "The natural man" cannot receive it, because it is spiritually discerned: but "he that is spiritual" judgeth all things, "and is judged of no man," 11—16.

AND I, brethren, <sup>a</sup> when I came to you, came not <sup>b</sup> with excellency of speech or of wisdom, declaring unto you <sup>c</sup> the testimony of God.

2 For I determined <sup>d</sup> not to know any thing among you, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified.

Note.—When the apostle came, as a Jewish stranger, among the polite, speculating, and licentious Corinthians; he did not attempt to catch their attention, by affected elegance or sublimity of language, by the trappings of human oratory, or by the plausible reasonings of philosophy. (Marg. Ref. a, b.) For it was his sole object to declare "the testimony of God," concerning the only way of salvation from eternal misery, and of obtaining eternal life; and a message of such immense importance would not admit of these worthless embellishments. (Marg. Ref. c.—Notes, Ps. 19: 7—11. 119: 2, 3. Is. 8: 20. John 3: 27—36. 1 John 5: 9—12.) Whatever knowledge he therefore possessed, either of Rabbinical or Grecian learning, he "determined" to keep it out of sight; and to preach, as if he had known no other subject, than that of Jesus the Messiah, even him who was crucified, and who was generally despised and execrated; and those things which related to redemption for sinners through his blood. This was the centre and substance of his preaching: but it is evident, that he did not confine himself wholly to this one topic, so as to exclude other parts of the revealed truth and will of God. For we are sure, from his own writings, that he preached man's relation to God, as his Creator, Benefactor, and Governor; the glorious perfections and the holy law of God; the future judgment and eternal state of righteous retributions; the lost estate of man, regeneration, repentance, conversion, the necessity of personal holiness, attention to relative duties; and in short "the whole counsel of God," as the great circumference to that circle, of which "Christ crucified" is the centre, in which all the lines meet. (Marg. Ref. d.—Notes, 1:20—24. Acts 20:18—21,25—27.) But, upon the most mature deliberation, he had "determined to know nothing," even among the refined and philosophical Corinthians, which did not elucidate, recommend, evince, or adorn, this great doctrine of salvation by the cross of Christ.—Declaring. (1) The apostle came as a messenger simply to deliver a message, even "the sure testimony of God," without alteration, omission, decoration, or addition; the whole of what he was sent to deliver, nothing more, and in all simplicity.—"What extraordinary claims 'are advanced,—what pretensions made in this chapter!—How pointed is it upon the subject 'of inspiration! If the sacred writers were in 'any degree true men, they were then fully inspired in all which they taught concerning religion. The miracles which they wrought 'prove them true men, whatever their pretensions might be, and their own words show 'what these pretensions were.'

3 And I was with you <sup>e</sup> in weakness, and in fear, and in much trembling.

5 That your faith should not † stand in the wisdom of men, <sup>i</sup> but in the power of God.

Note.—In adhering to his determination, the apostle had been deeply sensible of his own weakness and insufficiency, and aware of the prejudices and opposition which he had to encounter: and he was even oppressed with much "fear and trembling," lest his infirmity should prevent his success, or disgrace his glorious doctrine. (Marg. Ref. e.—Notes, Acts 18:1—17. 2 Cor. 10:7—11. 12:7—10. Gal. 4:12—16.) He had therefore acted among the Corinthians, with much diffidence, modesty, and meekness; and without any thought of making himself the head of a party, as some of their present teachers did. His address and style of preaching had been entirely devoid of "the persuasive words of man's wisdom," which often seduces men into error, and entices them into the views of designing orators, by moving the passions, impressing the imagination, and imposing on the judgment. On the contrary, he left the success of it to be produced entirely "by the demonstration of the Spirit," and the exertion of his divine power. Many expositors understand this exclusively of the miracles, by which the Holy Spirit powerfully demonstrated the truth of the gospel: or the prophecies which were fulfilled in those things, which the apostles preached concerning Jesus and his salvation: but these proofs, however conclusive, without the internal operation of the Holy Spirit, as the author of divine life in regeneration, would not have produced true faith; and it is unreasonable to confine the language to those operations, which were peculiar to one age, and to exclude such as are alike necessary, and alike to be depended on, in every age. (Marg. Ref. f—h.—Notes, 1 Thes. 1:5—8. 2:13—16.) The annexed reason, however, puts it beyond all reasonable doubt, that the latter were principally intended: for the apostle would use no other arts of persuasion, than that plain and faithful address to the hearts and consciences of men, which the Spirit of God always makes use of in convincing them of sin, and in powerfully demonstrating the truth and preciousness of the gospel to their souls: because he would not have their "faith to stand on the wisdom of men, but on the power of God." (Marg. Ref. i.—Notes, 1:17—19. 2 Cor. 4:7.) Now that faith, which is produced by outward miracles, and wholly rests on them, is no more saving, or to be depended on than that, which is the effect of logical reasonings or eloquent persuasions: (Notes, Acts 8:9—24.) but the faith, which is the effect of the inward and powerful teaching and "demonstration of the Spirit," rests on the power of God, and is supported by it; and will endure through all trials even to the end.

seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, "the things which God hath prepared for <sup>x</sup> them that love him.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The apostle disclaimed all pretensions to human wisdom, or learning; yet he would not allow his preaching to be really "foolishness." (Notes, 1:20—25.) Indeed, he and other faithful ministers, "spake wisdom among those who were perfect;" that is, who were so matured in judgment, experience, and spirituality, as to be able to receive it. (Marg. Ref. k.—Notes, Phil. 3:12—16. Heb. 5:11—14.) To persons of this description, they laid open the rich treasures of the wisdom of God, in his method of saving sinners, and in the dispensations of providence: and thus they excited their admiring adoration: and rendered them wise and intelligent in divine things, and, in respect of their true interest and whole duty, far beyond all other persons in the world. If, therefore, the Corinthians had not been initiated into the depths of this divine wisdom, it was, because they were not proper recipients of them. (Note, 3:1—3.) But this wisdom was totally distinct from "the wisdom of this world," and even in many things contrary to it, and to that of its princes and rulers; whose sagacity and policy could not prevent the speedy termination of all their grandeur, and their everlasting ruin, or that of their subjects and flatterers. (Marg. Ref. l—n.) For it was "the wisdom of God in a mystery," even in the mysterious design of glorifying his holy name and all his perfections, in the redemption of sinners, by the incarnation, righteousness, atoning sacrifice, and mediation of his co-equal Son. (Marg. Ref. o, p.—Notes, Rom. 16:25—27. Eph. 3:1—12. 1 Tim. 3:16.) This was ordained and intended by him, "before the world began," in order to bring his chosen people to everlasting glory: but it had been entirely hidden from men, except as made known by revelation, and as faith simply received that information. So that the Gentiles, with all their philosophical speculations, knew nothing of this wisdom; the unbelieving Jews, and their most learned Scribes, were wholly unacquainted with it: the Mosaic dispensation had only conveyed some general intimations of it: but the gospel had now discovered it more fully to all who were brought to embrace it. (Note, 2 Tim. 1:10.) Yet "none of the princes," or great men in the world's estimation, had known any thing of it: nay, their policy was diametrically opposite to it. For had Pilate, Herod, Caiaphas, or the Jewish rulers, understood this divine mystery; they would, at least by fear, have been restrained from crucifying "the Lord of glory," that divine Person, who, even when he hung upon the cross, was the Lord and "King of glory," God in human nature, the Governor and Judge of all the world. (Marg. Ref. q—s.—Notes, Ps. 24:7—10. Jam. 2:1—4, v. 1.) Thus the prophecies had been accomplished; and what had of old been written by Isaiah might be applied to the glorious redemption now proclaimed to mankind, and to the blessings conferred on those, and prepared for those, who were taught by the grace of the gospel to love and obey God; and which far exceeded all, that had been seen, heard, or thought of by men. (Marg. Ref. t—x.—Notes, 13:8—12, v. 12. Ps. 31:19,20. Is. 64:4.)

Note.—The apostles in general, and Paul in particular, had not discovered the mystery of divine wisdom, by their own superior sagacity: but "God had revealed it to them by his Spirit;" who not only searched all hearts, but was intimately acquainted with "the deep things of God," and all the inmost counsels of his infinite mind. For as no man can penetrate the recesses of another's understanding and heart, and know the whole of his thoughts and intentions, in the same way, that his own soul is conscious of them; so none can know, discover, or comprehend the things of God, but his own infinite Spirit; who is One with the Father and the Son, in the unity of the Godhead, and whose office it is to reveal divine mysteries to his church. (Marg. Ref. y—d.—Note, Matt. 11:27.)—This should be specially noted as a most decisive testimony both to the Deity and personality of the Holy Spirit. (Notes, 12:4—11. John 14:15—17, 25, 26. 15:26, 27. 16:8—11. Acts 5:1—11, vv. 3, 4, 9. 13:1—5, vv. 2, 4.)—Now the apostles had not “received the spirit of the world;” they were not actuated by those worldly principles, nor guided by that carnal prudence, of which Satan, “the spirit that worketh in the children of disobedience,” is in one way or other the concealed author: but they were inspired and actuated by “the Spirit of God,” that they might know, and communicate to the church, the things which God most freely bestows on all believers. These they declared, not in such words as man’s wisdom would have employed, but in simple plain language, dictated by the Holy Spirit: (Note, 3—5.) which sacred style was formed, by comparing one part of divine revelation with another; the spiritual nature of redemption with the holiness of the divine character and law; the former discoveries of the truth and will of God, with these later revelations; the types and prophecies with their accomplishment; and the remedy proposed, with the state of mankind, and their need of it. (Marg. Ref. e—k.) Thus their spiritual meditations, discoveries, and affections, under the teaching of the Holy Spirit, led them to use a solemn, energetic, and faithful method of speaking, which accorded to the majesty and importance of their subject, and the style of the sacred oracles; but totally differed from the affected oratory and enticing words of man’s wisdom.—The apostle here undoubtedly speaks of himself as divinely inspired, both in what he preached, and in what he wrote. (Note, 1 Pet. 1:10—12, v. 12.)—From this and the preceding verses, as also from the following, it is exceeding evident, that the apostles spake and wrote by inspiration of the Holy Ghost, as did the prophets of old time, and delivered only such things as from God, which God revealed to them by the Holy Spirit, according to those words of St. Peter: “We preach the gospel to you, with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven.” Whitby.—Probably Silvanus and Timothy also had immediate revelations from God. Others, who preach the same grand truths, have them only by mediate revelation; and the doctrine of all uninspired preachers must be assayed by that of the apostles. (Note, Matt. 16:19.)

15 But he that is spiritual * judgeth all things, yet he himself is † judged of no man.

16 For who hath known the mind of the Lord, that he ‡ may instruct him? but we have the mind of Christ.

Note.—It was not to be expected, that the faithful and solemn preaching of the gospel would please mankind in general; as “the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him.” (Marg. Ref. m—o.) The term here used has occasioned much disputation: but, as it is derived from a word, which sometimes at least signifies the rational soul; it may be supposed to have reference to the powers of his mind, as well as to his inferior inclinations.—It is opposed to the regenerate man, and to the glorified, that is, the perfectly regenerated, man. “A man that hath only natural abilities and perfections.” Leigh. One that has not the Spirit of God.—The apostle’s argument absolutely requires, that by “the natural man” we understand the unregenerate man, however sagacious, learned, or abstracted from sensual indulgences: for he opposes him to the spiritual man; and the pride of carnal reasoning is at least as opposite to spirituality, as the most grovelling sensuality can be. (Notes, Gal. 5:19—26.) No man, as naturally born into the world, and not supernaturally born again of the Spirit, “can see the kingdom of God,” or receive, in faith and love, the spiritual mysteries of redemption by the cross of Christ. (Notes, John 3:3—8. 14:15—17.) To all unregenerate men, these things will, in one way or other, appear “foolishness,” uninteresting, unnecessary, inconsistent, or absurd: and doubtless proud reasoners have scoffed at them, more than ever mere sensualists did. (Notes, 1:20—25.) No ingenuity, address, or reasoning of the preacher can prevent this effect; no application of the man’s own mind, except in humble dependence on the teaching of the Holy Spirit, can enable him to perceive the real nature and glory of them. “For they are spiritually discerned,” that is, by the illuminating and sanctifying work of the Spirit of God upon the mind; by which a spiritual capacity is produced, which discerns, admires, loves, and delights in the divine excellency of heavenly things. When this change has taken place, and a man’s spiritual senses have been matured by growth and exercise, he may be called “a spiritual man:” and he perceives the spiritual glory and excellency of every truth and precept in the word of God; he distinguishes one object from another by a spiritual taste, or a kind of extemporaneous judgment, and so he becomes a competent judge in these matters. Yet his views, principles, and motives do not fall under the judgment of any other men: none are competent to decide on the propriety of his conduct, as they are strangers to those views and discoveries, which direct his determinations. (Marg. Ref. p—r.—Note, Acts 16: 1—3. P. O. 1—12.) For “who hath known the mind of the Lord,” or can be capable of “instructing him” who is inspired by the Holy Spirit? As therefore the apostle, and other inspired persons, were made acquainted with “the mind of Christ,” by whom the Father reveals himself to men: none of those who presumed to judge them could be competent to decide, either upon their doctrine, or their manner of communicating it. They were, in the very order of things, above such instructors or censurers, who could not possibly understand the principles on which they acted. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. s, t.) In a measure, all “spiritual” men “have the mind of Christ,” and unregenerate men are incompetent judges of their conduct: yet this is in every thing to be tried by the word of God; and nothing must be justified or excused, which does not accord with that rule, when properly explained. But the inspired apostles were employed to state that “mind of Christ,” by which men’s principles and actions must be judged, both at present, and at the day of judgment; and, in this respect, they could not be liable to be judged by any man.—Some indeed explain the last verse, as an inquiry whether any man had so known the mind of the Lord, as to be competent to give him any counsel or instruction. (Notes, Rom. 11:33—36.) But the context rather fixes the meaning to the preceding interpretation; and the apostle intended to expose the absurdity of a “natural” man presuming to instruct “a spiritual man,” in respect of “spiritual things!” or of an ordinary Christian or teacher presuming to censure or dictate to an inspired apostle, as he thus declared himself to be! It is probable that he had in mind the words of the prophet Isaiah; but he does not expressly quote them. (Note, Is. 40:12—17.) “The mind of Christ,” is “the mind of the Lord.”

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

How surprising is it, that this most honored servant of Christ should be constrained to justify his divinely excellent and useful preaching, even to the very persons, who had been converted by it! But this surprise should be connected with a pleasing and grateful admiration of the divine wisdom, in taking occasion from that circumstance, to give the church most valuable instructions, concerning the best method of “declaring the testimony of God” to sinners. This requires no “excellency of speech” or of wisdom to enforce it; but appears most venerable, when the witness for God is regardless of human applause or censure; when his whole soul is occupied, by zeal for the honor of his Lord, and compassion for perishing sinners; when he is willing even among the learned and polite, to be counted ignorant in other respects; when “he determines to know nothing but Christ crucified,” and the gracious message which he is sent to deliver in his name.—But if this arduous service made even this great apostle to fear and tremble, through conscious weakness: what reason have we to be humble and diffident, when called to declare the same testimony to mankind! (Note, 2 Cor. 2:14—17.) How should we fear disgracing this honorable ministry, by our own folly or sin! At what a distance should we keep from all ambition and self-confidence! How carefully should we remember that all “our sufficiency is of God” alone! Such humility and meekness adorn, and give dignity to, that holy constancy and boldness, with which we ought to plead the cause of God: and a realizing sense of eternal things, of the worth of souls, the awful danger of ungodly men, the preciousness of Christ, and the importance of our message, will counteract our natural propensity to shrink from “declaring the whole counsel of God,” to trifle, or to affect “the enticing words of man’s wisdom.” The more deeply we are convinced, that no arguments or eloquence of man can by their own efficacy produce saving faith; the greater care we shall take to speak in a plain, serious, and scriptural manner; and in imitation of those preachers of old, whose word was attended with “demonstration of the Spirit and of power:” depending singly on his effectual operation to bring our hearers to believe to the salvation of their souls.—The maxims of “human wisdom,” whether philosophical or political, will soon “come to nought,” and sink into contempt. But experienced believers are made acquainted with such glorious displays of wisdom, as eclipse all that they before admired; even as the rising sun obscures the glimmering lamp. The things which “God ordained before the world,” in order to bring his chosen people to glory, are such as “angels desire to look into:” they give the humbled and enlightened mind those views of God, and his perfections, works, and ways, which fix it in astonishment, excite it to adoration, inspire it with love and gratitude, raise it above this earthly clod and all its puny concerns; and enlarge it into the most holy, exalted, yet humble ambition after true honor and greatness. But this wisdom must still be “hidden” from the proud, the carnal, and the unbelieving, notwithstanding the fulness and clearness, with which it is revealed in the gospel.—The same principles, which influenced “the princes of the world” to “crucify the Lord of glory,” still possess the minds of men in general: and avarice, sensuality, or pride and ambition of worldly honor and distinction, still lead men to despise those good things which “God hath prepared for them that love him,” though ‘they pass man’s understanding,’ and infinitely excel in glory and value whatever he has seen or heard, or can possibly imagine. They “are prepared for those who love God:” (Notes, Rom. 8:23

V. 10—16.

No man truly understands or properly values divine revelation, except that divine Spirit, “who searcheth all things, even the deep things of God,” and who revealed them to the apostles, removes the veil from his heart, and enables him to perceive their real excellency. (Notes, and P. O. 2 Cor. 3:7—18.) On this great Teacher we must simply depend, while we seek to know “the things that are freely given by God” to his people, and to obtain the assurance that we belong to that favored company. If indeed we are delivered from “the spirit of the world,” and are taken under the guidance of “the Spirit of God;” we shall more and more regard the words of the sacred scripture; and, “comparing spiritual things with spiritual,” our holy discernment will increase, and we shall acquire a faculty in speaking on religious subjects, in language in some degree suited to their divine nature and infinite importance. But whoever teaches, or what language soever is employed; “the natural man” will either oppose, despise, or pervert “the things of the Spirit of God;” he cannot cordially receive or rightly understand them: they will remain foolishness to him, because he is destitute of spiritual discernment. On the other hand, he who is “born of God,” however destitute of genius and learning, will become spiritual, and capable of discerning the harmony and glory of divine truth: he will experience its sanctifying effects in his heart, and produce correspondent fruits in his life. His judgment and conduct will be formed upon the word of God; and those who presume to judge, condemn, or deride him, for violating the maxims of worldly wisdom, will only show their own ignorance and arrogance. They cannot instruct him “in spiritual things,” by carnal reasonings: they have not “known the mind of the Lord” Jesus, or they would not condemn him for acting according to it: and they can no more argue him out of his principles, experience, hope, or duty, than a man with good eyes, could be convinced that there is no light from the sun, or that light is neither pleasant or profitable, by the ingenious sophisms of a man who has been blind from his birth. (Notes, Ps. 25:14. P. O. John 9:24—41. Notes, 2 Pet. 1:19. 1 John 5:9,10. Rev. 2:17.)

CHAP. III.

The apostle shows, that he could not impart to the Corinthians the deeper mysteries of the gospel, because they were carnal, 1—3; as it appeared from their divisions, 4. All true ministers are servants to one Lord, 5; who employs them in cultivating his field, and in building his temple, and who alone renders their labors successful, 6—9 The apostle had laid the only true Foundation, and others should take care what they build on it, for their work would be tried as by fire, 10—15. Christians are the temple of God and it would be extremely perilous to defile that temple, 16, 17. Worldly wisdom is foolishness with God; and none ought to glory in men; for all things belong to those who are Christ's, 18—23.

3 For ye are yet carnal: <sup>f</sup> for whereas there is among you envying, and strife, and <sup>g</sup> divisions, are ye not carnal, <sup>h</sup> and walk <sup>i</sup> as men?

Note.—Many of the Corinthians had been seduced into a mean opinion of the apostle's ministry, because he had not fully instructed them in those abstruse subjects, on which some of their teachers had particularly insisted, and about which they plausibly speculated: he therefore here assigns the reason of his conduct in this respect. Though they had been plenteously endued with supernatural gifts and knowledge; (Note, 1:4—9.) yet he had observed those things in their disposition and conduct, which rendered it improper for him to speak to them, as to “spiritual” men, who were competent to receive the deeper discoveries of divine wisdom: and thus he was constrained to address them “as carnal, even as babes in Christ.” (Marg. Ref. a—c.—Notes, 2:14—16. Matt. 16:21—23, v. 23. Rom. 7:13, 14.) For though he looked on them in general as sincere converts, and thus in a measure “spiritual,” yet, even till he left them, they were so far from maturity of judgment and experience, and so prone to carnal passions, that he deemed it incumbent on him “to feed them with milk;” as the nurse does the infant, “and not with strong meat,” which they could not digest. (Notes, Heb. 5:11—14. 1 Pet. 2:1—3.) The simplest truths of the gospel, respecting the sinfulness of man, and the rich mercy of God as shown in redemption by the blood of Emmanuel; with regeneration, “repentance, and works meet for repentance,” faith in our Lord Jesus Christ, the necessity and nature of holiness; the influences and fruits of the Spirit; the day of judgment, and eternal happiness and misery; delivered in the simplest, plainest language, suited them far better, than those deeper mysteries, which led to more speculation, and which afforded the teacher a fairer opportunity of showing his knowledge, ingenuity, and capacity. On these the apostle did not much insist; because he knew the Corinthians could not bear them; (Marg. Ref. d, e.—Notes, Mark 4:33,34. John 16:12,13.) and likewise that such instructions would feed carnal passions, instead of faith and love. Indeed, though a considerable time had since elapsed, they were not yet able to receive and make a good use of these sublimer truths, because they were still under the influence of worldly principles. This needed no other proof than their well-known conduct: for, while they envied one another the gifts which God had bestowed on them, and with emulation sought their own credit in the exercise of them; (Notes, 14.) while there subsisted eager contentions and lamentable divisions among them; could they deny that they were “carnal,” and acted more like men of the world, in their competitions and contests for honors and distinctions, or for the interest of a party, or the credit of a favorite orator or philosopher, than like "spiritual" men? The principles and affections of "the natural man" were more prominent in their conduct, than the humble, meek, loving, and peaceable dispositions, which spring from regeneration.—It is evident that by carnal, and as men, the apostle does not here intend the prevalence of sensual appetites, but that of malignant passions; not the propensities of the animal, but those of the fallen spirit: and this may confirm the interpretation given of this, and similar words, in other places. (Notes, Rom. 8:1—13. Gal. 5:19—26.)—As "spiritual" is opposed to "carnal," it must relate exclusively to the sanctifying grace of the Holy Spirit; and not at all to miraculous endowments. The Corinthians were enriched with the latter; but some of them seemed altogether destitute of the former, and the generality of them were but "babes in Christ."

and his beloved brother Apollos, had been set up for the heads of the contending parties, the contests of the Corinthians would have proved them to be carnal. (Notes, 1:10—16. 4:6,7.) For who were Paul and Apollos? Not "lords over God's heritage," but ministering servants to them for Christ's sake; by whose labors they had been brought to believe the gospel, according to the gift of God, both to the ministers, and to those converted by them. (Marg. Ref. i—l.—Notes, Matt. 20:24—28. 2 Cor. 1:23,24. 1 Pet. 5:1—4.)—"For what reason do you regard either the one or the other? Is it on no consideration but that of talents, which they 'have in common with many who are strangers to the gospel? Or ought it not to be in a different view, even because they are the ministers of Christ?' Doddridge.—Indeed Paul had been sent to inclose and plant the Lord's vineyard at Corinth; and when he had done this, Apollos had followed him to water it: but God alone had given the increase, and made the plants to grow and become fruitful. (Marg. Ref. m, n.—Notes, Acts 18:1—11, 24—28.) "The power of growing, in this sacred agriculture, is neither by nature in the plants themselves, nor inserted by the diligence of the cultivator: but it springs entirely from the grace and efficacy of the Holy Spirit. ... Not that their labor is 'vain; ... for 'faith comes by hearing;' but 'first, God does not use their ministry, because 'he needs either it or them, or is unable to do 'without them: again, they could not perform 'what they do, unless God of his mere mercy 'had constituted them his laborers. But especially, because all their work is external, God 'alone claiming to himself exclusively all that is 'inwardly done in man's salvation; that his 'Restorer unto life eternal may be one and the 'same, who was his Creator to this present life.' Beza. Thus neither of the instruments were any thing compared with the great Agent. (P. O. John 11:28—40.) Yet both ministers were as one; both acted as servants in the same work, and with the same intention of glorifying God, by seeking the salvation of souls: and they would each receive a gracious reward from their common Master, who was the only competent Judge of their faithfulness and diligence. For they were "fellow-laborers of God:" while the church at Corinth was his husbandry, in which he employed and wrought by them; it was "God's building," which he was erecting by their means, according to his own plan, for his own glory, and to be his holy temple: and they did the work which he set them to do, and no more. [Practical Observations.]

Note.—Thus far the apostle proceeded on the supposition, that the laborers were skilful and faithful; but he meant to lead the attention of the Corinthians to some who were not so. He therefore declared, that, "according to the grace bestowed on him," (Notes, 15:3—11, vs. 10, 11. Rom. 12:3—5. Eph. 4:7—10.) he had laid the Foundation of "God's building" among them, like a wise architect; and he knew that it was capable of supporting the whole weight of the intended superstructure. But since he left Corinth, "another had builded on" his Foundation; nay, several had been employed in that work: but "let every one take heed" with what materials, and in what manner, he carried on the building. (Marg. Ref. z, a.) The apostle knew that no man could lay any other foundation of a spiritual temple, for the glory of God, or for the sinner's hope of salvation, than what he had laid in his preaching, and which God had laid in his purpose, and by the gospel; namely, the Person, mediatorial office, righteousness, atonement, intercession, and grace of the Lord Jesus Christ. (Marg. Ref. b.—Notes, Is. 28:16. Matt. 16:18. Rom. 10:1—4. Eph. 2:19—22. 1 Pet. 2:4—6.) If a man laid any other foundation than this, he could not be considered as one of "the fellow-laborers of God." (9) The apostle did not here put the supposition, that this was the case with any of their teachers. Yet, even on this Foundation, very different materials might be builded: some might carry on the work with "gold, silver, and valuable stones;" others with "wood, hay, or stubble." (Marg. Ref. c—e.) Some, who preached the doctrine of salvation by faith in Christ, would instruct believers from the word of God, in all the great and holy truths of the gospel in due connexion, proportion, and symmetry; show them their obligations and duties; and teach them to evidence their faith, by spiritual worship and devoted holy obedience. Others might substitute false doctrines, human inventions, abrogated ceremonies, and philosophical speculations; or deduce licentious inferences from the doctrines of grace. (Notes, 5:1—5. Gal. 4:8—11. Col. 2:8, 9.) Thus the building might be deformed and weakened, by such additions and base materials, as would never stand the trial which God had appointed. For the time was coming, when the nature and value of "every man's work" would be made manifest: the day of judgment would openly declare it. The materials of this spiritual building, and every man's work in it, must be "tried as by fire," during the discoveries of that solemn season. This will prove them "of what sort they are:" the "gold, silver, and precious stones" will stand the fire, and even be purified by it; and he who has built with these approved materials will receive an abundant reward: but "the wood, hay, and stubble" will be burned; and he, who has spent his time and labor in building with such worthless materials, will suffer great loss, even in respect of the degree of his future glory; yet, provided he is indeed fixed on the good Foundation, he shall finally be saved. (Marg. Ref. f—i.) It will however be, as a man is preserved from the flames of his house, when he escapes naked through them, and thus narrowly saves his life with the loss of all his property. So extremely dangerous is it to teach false doctrines, even in connexion with fundamental truths! (Marg. Ref. k—m.)—The extreme absurdity of the papists, in producing this passage, in support of their doctrine of purgatory, is very obvious: but it is to be feared, that the zealous abettors of that doctrine, and many others of a similar nature, will be found to build wholly without a foundation. 17 If <sup>a</sup> any man * defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy: <sup>r</sup> for the temple of God is holy; which temple ye are.

Note.—The metaphor of a building led the apostle to inquire, whether the Christians at Corinth did not know, that they were “the temple of God,” and that the Holy Spirit dwelt in them. (Marg. Ref. o, p.—Notes, 6:18—20. Is. 57:15,16. John 14:21—24. Rom. 8:10,11. 2 Cor. 6:14—18. Eph. 2:19—22. 1 Pet. 2:4—6.)—The indwelling of the Holy Spirit constitutes “the temple of God;” this is express testimony to his Deity. Now, if any man defiled or profaned the temple of God, he would be exposed to his indignation, and might expect the most terrible destruction; because of the holiness of the temple, as consecrated to God. (Marg. Ref. q, r.) It would therefore be extremely dangerous for any one, by false doctrines or a licentious example, to defile the church, or any of its members: and if the teachers were chargeable with a crime of so aggravated a nature, they would have reason to fear the severest judgments of God; and would be presumptuous in expecting to be “saved even as by fire.” (Note, 10—15, v. 15.)—“They are said by the apostle to defile the temple of God, who corrupted the purity of the gospel by carnal eloquence; and who rent ‘the church by factions.’ Beza.—‘The like words used, (6:16—19.) by way of dehortation from fornication, and (2 Cor. 6:16.) from ‘communion with heathen, in their idolatrous rites and heathen practices; and by way of inducement to “cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit;” (2 Cor. 7:1.) ‘more naturally incline us to refer these verses to the corrupting of the temple of God, by uncleanness and fornication, or by idolatrous practices; both which the Corinthians did.’ Whitby. It does not, however, appear, that there is any necessity of confining the interpretation to this or the other kind of defilement: and in proportion as the declaration is made general, it becomes more and more important. The verb, rendered “destroy,” is the same with that before translated “defile.” The Jews polluted the temple of God by their crimes, and were given up into the hands of their enemies as polluted, to be destroyed by them: the temple was given up to be profaned and destroyed for their crimes: and part of the awful doom of the wicked is thus expressed, “He that is filthy, let him be filthy still.” (Notes, 2 Tim. 2:19. 3:13. Rev. 11:1,2. 22:10—12.)

Note.—The Corinthians were induced to great things offered to idols, in the idol-temples, by men pretending to great knowledge. ... (8:1,2.) They also introduced among them the doctrine of the lawfulness of fornication. (5:1.) ... These teachers seem to have been the Nicolaitans, who received their doctrine from the ‘philosophers.’ Whitby. (Note, Rev. 2:14—16.)—However this may be, the persons more immediately concerned in the preceding warning, were in danger of despising it, especially coming from one whom they disregarded, as far beneath them in knowledge and wisdom: but let them not “deceive themselves” in this matter. (Marg. Ref. s.) If any one of them appeared “to be wise in this world;” instead of trusting to such a distinction, “let him become a fool,” in his own opinion, and in that of worldly men; and indeed this would be absolutely necessary, in order to his being made wise unto everlasting life. (Marg. Ref. t, u.—Note, Matt. 18:1—4.) For God accounted “the wisdom of this world” to be folly: he ensnared the worldly-wise in their own politics and devices, and he knew their reasonings and imaginations to be vain and worthless. The abilities, gifts, and services of apostles and ministers, were intended for their benefit; the world, and every thing in it, belonged to them, as far as it could do them good; its possessions would be given them, if really profitable; its enmity would discipline them for heaven: and all providential appointments would promote their sanctification. “Life” would be ensured to them, till their work was done, and they were ripe for their reward; “death,” at the appointed hour, would come, as their friend, to deliver them from sin and sorrow, and con-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

Ministers should suit their instruction to the state and wants of their hearers, and teach them such things, as more immediately tend to their edification; rather than insist continually on those subjects, which are agreeable to their own inclinations, or those of any party.—"Babes" in Christ must be "fed with milk, and not with strong meat:" many doctrines, which they may hereafter feed upon and digest into strengthening nutriment, would at present be useless, or pernicious; because they are not able to perceive the tendency of them, or their harmony with other truths.—Men may have much doctrinal knowledge, and yet be mere novices in the life of faith and experience: nay, their promptitude to speculations, and their acuteness in them, may prove them to be in a great degree "carnal," and very imperfectly grounded even in the first principles of experimental and practical religion. Thus many professed Christians, yea preachers, show themselves to be "yet carnal," by their vain-glorious emulations, their eagerness for controversy, their selfish fiery zeal, their disposition to prefer and exalt themselves, and to despise and revile others; and their apparent delight in disturbing the peace of the church. This is the tendency of sin, not of grace; the temper of the "carnal," "the natural man," and not of the "spiritual:" and we want a large measure of that "love which hopeth all things," to suppose, that wranglers of this kind have any spirituality, or are even "babes in Christ." It is, however, an universal rule, that these evils proportionably prove, that the carnal mind is prominent and prevalent: and while so many are saying, "I am of Paul, and I of Apollos;" we may fairly demand of them, whether they be not altogether carnal. For, what are the most able ministers, but servants of Christ and of his people? They do not come in their own name, or about their own business; they do not seek their own glory, or interest, or ease, or indulgence: sin and folly are all that they have of their own, and their wisdom and grace are wholly from the Lord. (Note, John 1:16.) By his help, they may "plant and water;" but he alone can "give the increase:" so that they are "nothing," and he alone must be considered as the Object of confidence and attachment, as well as of our adoring love and gratitude.—Faithful ministers indeed are afraid of receiving undue honor. Though their rank and abilities may differ, they are all "one;" they are engaged in the same work, and aim at the same object: they are "fellow-laborers of God," in his spiritual husbandry and building; and he will graciously reward the services, which, by his grace, they have performed. Indeed, all those, who, in their several places, labor by scriptural means to promote the cause of true religion, are "workers together with God;" (Notes, 1 Sam. 14:45, 46. Acts 14:24—28. Rom. 15:18—21.) but all ungodly men, especially persecutors, false teachers, seducers, tempters, and such as employ their ingenuity in disseminating infidelity, impiety, and licentiousness, are "fellow-workers" with the devil, in rendering others wicked and miserable; and their recompense will be proportioned to their zeal, diligence, and success.

V. 10—15.

It is a great comfort to the minister of Christ, when, on reflection, he is humbly conscious of having, like "a wise architect," laid a right Foundation: but every man should also take heed what "he buildeth upon it." For, while many attempt in vain to substitute some other foundation, in the stead of Christ, and so perish with their deluded followers; there are likewise numbers, who lay the right Foundation, and yet build worthless materials upon it, to their own great loss and danger, and to the great peril and detriment of their hearers. In expectation therefore of that solemn day, when "every man's work shall be manifested," and "tried as by fire;" we should now be careful to build with approved and precious materials: we should most carefully reject all superstitious inventions, unscriptural doctrines, enthusiastical delusions, and philosophical speculations; nay indeed a variety of trifling inquiries and disputations, about which many, who seem to lay the right Foundation, waste their time, and lose their labor, while they injure the building and endanger their own souls. We should bestow pains to procure gold, silver, and precious stones for this work from the inexhaustible stores of the sacred oracles; that, with sound doctrine, and scriptural instructions, we may build up the souls of believers in knowledge, hope, love, and obedience; that, by our labors, example, and prayers, they may grow up "a holy temple to the Lord." Thus our work will abide the fiery trial, and we shall receive "a full reward," and have "an abundant entrance ministered unto us into the everlasting kingdom of Christ."—It is peculiarly incumbent upon ministers, in all their studies, pursuits, sermons, publications, and conversation, to recollect that their "work must be tried by fire;" to anticipate the sentiments, which the day of judgment will inevitably obtrude upon them, concerning their present occupations; and to reflect on the irreparable loss of spending their time of service to no purpose, or perniciously; to consider the tendency of their undertakings; to compare them with the word of God; and to "judge themselves that they may not be judged of the Lord." For if shame and sorrow could enter heaven; surely the minister, whose work shall be burned, yet "he himself saved as through fire," would be overwhelmed with these distressing feelings.

V. 16—23.

When faithful admonitions have no effect on the minds of men, their state is very awful. It is proper, however, to warn them, with all solemnity, concerning the guilt and danger of "defiling the temple of God," by their false doctrines and bad examples. Many of them will indeed despise the warning, and "deceive themselves." (Note, 6:9—11. Gal. 6:6—10. Eph. 5:5—7.)—The reputation, of being "wise in this world," is no favorable evidence of a man's character; as "the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God," who "takes the wise in their own craftiness," and exposes the vanity of their counsels and speculations. It cannot therefore be too earnestly inculcated on all, to "cease from their own wisdom," and to be willing to think themselves "fools," and to be thought so by others; that they may become wise by the teaching of the word and Spirit of God. (Note, 4:9—13.)—But we all should remember that true Christians are "the temple of God," who dwell in them by his sanctifying Spirit: and those who know not this can hardly be thought even "habes in Christ." If we are conscious of this spiritual consecration to God, to be his living temples; let us be careful to have our sacred character adorned by a holy conversation, and to avoid whatever may defile either ourselves or our fellow Christians. And surely he is deceived, who deems himself the temple of the Holy Spirit; and yet is unconcerned, or but little concerned, about personal holiness, or about the purity and peace of the church!—If indeed we are the children of God, we have something nobler to glory in, than in men, and our relation and attachment to them; for "all things are ours;" apostles, prophets, ministers, ordinances, providential dispensations, earth, heaven, life, death, things temporal, and things eternal are ours; and shall be ours for ever, notwithstanding all our most powerful enemies, sharp conflicts, and our lamented weakness and sin that still dwelleth in us: for indeed we are one with Christ, and his purchased and redeemed people; and he is One with the Father. (Note, Col. 3:1—4. rr. 3,4.) As the glory of God is displayed in Christ his Son, our salvation is secured in Christ our Head, who will cause us to sit down as conquerors, through him "upon his throne, even as he hath overcome, and hath sat down with his Father upon his throne." (Note, Rev. 3:20—22.)

CHAP. IV.

The apostles, and preachers of the gospel, should be accounted of as ministering servants to Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God; and they are required as such to be faithful, 1, 2. They must be led to the judgment of the Lord at his coming, 3—5. The apostle exhorts the Corinthians, not to be puffed up for one against another, as all have their different endowments from God, 6, 7. He contrasts their vain-glory and supposed proficiency with his own despised and afflicted state, and lowly conduct, 8—13. He warns them, as then only "father in Christ," and exhorts them to imitate him, 14—16. For this purpose he had sent Timothy unto them, 17; and intended to come himself, and to make trial of the power of those who opposed him, 18—21.

Note.—Lest the Corinthians should conclude, from what the apostle had said, that little respect or affection was due to ministers; he here showed them, in what estimation they ought to hold them, and by what measure they ought to regulate their regard to them. Whether they were apostles, evangelists, or ordinary pastors and teachers, they ought to consider them, not indeed as lords, but as the "ministering servants of Christ" for their benefit, in the highest and most important office; even as the "stewards of the mysteries of God;" as his immediate representatives, appointed by his authority, they should preside in his family, take care of his interest and honor, instruct and direct the services of their brethren, and give every one his portion in due season. (Marg. Ref. b, c.—Notes, Matt. 24:45—51. 25:14—30. Luke 16:1—8. 1 Pet. 4:9—11.) Thus they were entrusted, with the mysterious and sublime truths of the gospel, that they might preach them to the people; and apply them with suitable admonitions, exhortations, encouragements, and warnings, according to what every one's case required, in order to the conversion of sinners, and the establishment and edification of believers. (Marg. Ref. d.—Notes, Matt. 13:10, 11. Rom. 16:25—27. Eph. 3:1—7. Col. 2:1—4. 1 Tim. 3:16.)—Some, by "the mysteries of God," understand also the administration of the sacraments, which were commonly called "mysteries" by the ancient fathers: but though this is a part of the minister's work; yet the external ordinances are not called "mysteries" in scripture; and this name, afterwards given them, helped to lead men to form a wrong judgment concerning them, which has in every age, produced, and still does produce, most mischievous effects; by leading men to confound the sign of godliness with the thing signified, and with the power of godliness. "That which this day is generally called a sacrifice, is the sign of the true Sacrifice. If the sacraments had not a

Thus baptism was called regeneration, and the Lord’s supper, a sacrifice: till the things signified were lost sight of, and the sign alone regarded, and idolized. And alas! it is so still, not only among Papists, but to a very great degree, in the Protestant, Lutheran, and reformed churches, with their rulers and teachers.—Now, it was well known, that exact fidelity was the most essential qualification required “in a steward.” A man of strict probity, attached to his master’s interest, and impartial in his conduct towards his fellow-servants, might be a valuable steward, though his accomplishments were but moderate and his address uncourtly; but nothing could compensate for the want of “faithfulness.” Thus a minister who, uprightly and simply, sought the glory of God and the good of souls; and who impartially dispensed the truths of God, without respect of persons, or regard to his own interest, honor, ease, or indulgence, would be accepted by the Lord, and ought to be valued by believers; though not so eminent in natural endowments, eloquence, learning, or polite accomplishments; or even in spiritual gifts and attainments, as others were, who sought themselves in their admired ministrations.

3 But with me <sup>f</sup> it is a very small thing that I should be judged of you, or of man’s * judgment: yea, I judge not mine own self.

4 For <sup>g</sup> I know nothing by myself; <sup>h</sup> yet am I not hereby justified: <sup>i</sup> but he that judgeth me is the Lord.

5 Therefore <sup>k</sup> judge nothing before the time, <sup>l</sup> until the Lord come, <sup>m</sup> who both will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and will make manifest the counsels of the hearts: and then shall every man have <sup>n</sup> praise of God.

Note.—The apostle counted it “a very small matter,” compared with the acceptance of his gracious Lord, what judgment the Corinthians, or any man, formed of him; whether they supposed him to be faithful or not; or whether they were offended with him for his faithfulness, and despised him because he had not “come with excellency of speech or of wisdom.” Indeed he did not rely on his own judgment concerning himself, because he was aware of the deceitfulness of the human heart: for though he was not indeed conscious of any unfaithfulness or self-seeking in his ministry; yet this was not sufficient to justify him before God, who often saw that evil in the heart, which pride and self-flattery hid from the man himself. He therefore sought to the Lord to judge him, and so waited for that day when he must appear before his tribunal. (Marg. Ref. f—i.—Notes, 8:10—15. 2 Cor. 5:9—12.) Knowing, however, that many were disposed to think unfavorably of him, through the artifices of their seducers; he exhorted them not to judge matters of this importance before the time; but to leave them, till the Lord should come to judgment, when characters and actions would appear in another light, than they did at present. (Note, Rom. 14:10—12.) For the Judge will then both discover the secret sins of men’s lives, which they had veiled in darkness from the view of their neighbors; and disclose the motives and intentions, which lay concealed in the impenetrable recesses of the heart; and which would, in numberless instances, appear to be designing, ambitious, and selfish, when the man’s words and works were most specious and plausible. (Marg. Ref. k—m.—Notes, Ec. 12:11—14, v. 14. Rom. 2:12—16. Heb. 4:12, 13. Rev. 20:11—15.) On the other hand, those holy desires, and pure motives, and secret acts of piety and charity, which men overlooked or slandered, will be shown in the full light of day. (Notes, Ps. 37:5—8. Matt. 6:1—4.) Then the faithful steward will be proportionably honored, with the commendation of God himself, which would abundantly counterbalance the contempt and reproach of men: (Marg. Ref. n.—Notes, Matt. 25:19—23. 1 Pet. 1:6,7.) but it will be a day of detection and confusion to all hypocritical, ambitious, and self-seeking teachers, however admired and extolled.—Hence note, that Jesus Christ must have the knowledge of ‘the secrets of the hearts of all men, subject to his judgment; and so must be that God, who alone knows the hearts of all men. ... 1 Kings 8:39. 1 Chr. 28:9. Jer. 17:10.’ Whitby. (Note, Rev. 2:20—23.)—‘This saying of Paul,’ (“Judge nothing before the time,”) ‘must be restrained to a certain hypothesis: for both ‘the spirits are to be tried, and we ought to “judge ourselves whether we be in the faith.” ‘The apostle does not even condemn the private judgments of charity; and much less ‘either civil or ecclesiastical polity. For he is ‘not, properly, discoursing about the examination of men’s doctrine or manners; but rather ‘concerning the estimate that is to be made of ‘each person by men, which, says he, the Lord ‘will at last judge. Finally, when he says, ‘that he “knew nothing by himself;” it must ‘be referred to the subject of which he was ‘treating, namely, the ministerial office; which, ‘he testifies, he had fulfilled among the Corinthians, with so good a conscience, that he ‘could not charge himself with any fraud or ‘negligence. ... 6 And ° these things, brethren, I have in a figure transferred to myself and to Apollos P for your sakes; q that ye might learn in us not to think of men above that which is written, that no one of you r be puffed up for one against another.

7 For s who * maketh thee to differ from another? t and what hast thou that thou didst not receive? now if thou didst receive it, u why dost thou glory, as if thou hadst not received it?

[Pr etical Observations.]

Note.—In speaking of those, who had been considered as heads of different parties at Corinth, the apostle had chiefly mentioned himself and Apollos; and thus to avoid giving offence, he had, as by a figure, transferred the case from the persons principally concerned, to those whom he could not be thought disposed to undervalue; that in them, the teachers might learn not to be "wise in their own conceits;" and the people not to think too highly of men, calling them masters, or glorying in being their disciples; and thus esteeming them as something more than servants or stewards, or above what he had written according to the word of God, and on other accounts than because of their faithfulness. (Marg. Ref. n—q.—Notes, Matt. 23:8—12. Rom. 12:3—8.) Indeed, both they and the teachers (whom they placed in competition with each other, and about whom they were puffed up,) ought to inquire "who had made them to differ," from their idolatrous neighbors, or their fellow-Christians. Was this difference the effect of their superior merit, docility, or goodness? "What had they, which they had not received" as free gifts, or as talents committed to their stewardship? Why then did they "glory" and boast; as if they had been the independent authors of those endowments, by which they were distinguished from others; and as if they were authorized to employ to their own glory or advantage, without being accountable to God for them? Surely, such self-exaltation must be most absurd, abominable, and sacrilegious. (Marg. Ref. r—u).—It is evident, that the apostle is here more immediately speaking of natural abilities and spiritual gifts; and not of regenerating and efficacious grace. Yet if we all are, by nature, entirely depraved; if we must be born again, and new created; if it "is God that worketh in us to will and to do of his good pleasure," and if "by grace we are saved through faith, and that not of ourselves, it is the gift of God;" the apostle's reasoning is at least as conclusive, against all kinds and degrees of self-preference on account of our religious attainments, and all glorying in ourselves and other men, as against that which he was directly opposing. (Marg. Ref. x, y.—Note, 3:1—3.) Many of them, it is probable, were in prosperous circumstances, and exempted from persecution; they had abundance of spiritual gifts; they grew vain of their distinctions; and they deemed themselves pre- eminent above other churches: and thus they were led to use this improper language one among another; but the apostle intimated that they were under a lamentable delusion. (Note, Rev. 3:17.) He indeed most cordially desired, that they should be as happy, prosperous, honorable, and eminent, as they thought themselves: for then he knew that he should have comfort in them, and credit among them. If they had really "reigned as kings," he should have "reigned with them;" instead of being

Note.—It appeared to St. Paul, that God had chosen him and the other apostles, to be set apart, like those condemned persons in the gladiatorial shows, who were brought forth last without any defensive armor, to fight with each other, or to be exposed to wild beasts, till they were slain in the sight of the spectators; and who, if they escaped at one time, were only reserved to another day of slaughter: being "appointed unto death," and having no hope of more than a short respite. Thus, the apostles were distinguished by a larger share of contempt, hardship, and suffering, than any of their brethren; and were appointed to martyrdom at the end of their course, and as the only termination of their trials: that, conflicting with exceedingly urgent difficulties and distresses, in patient faith and persevering hope, and supported by omnipotent grace, they might be "a spectacle" to the whole intelligent creation, both men and angels; while all holy beings beheld them with solicitous affection and astonishment; and unholy beings with malice, rage, and disappointment. (Marg. Ref. b—e.) In this conflict Paul and his brethren were counted "fools for Christ's sake;" (Notes, Acts 17: 13. 26:24—29.) not only by unconverted Jews and Gentiles, but by the Christians at Corinth also; who accounted themselves to be "wise in Christ," through the admired instructions of their speculating teachers, the liberty to which they supposed themselves entitled, and the politic methods which they used for escaping contempt and persecution. They thought the apostle, and such as he, weak, timid, and scrupulous Christians, men of feeble minds, narrow capacities, and inferior attainments: but they supposed themselves "strong" in faith, of great discernment, and superior to those fears and disquietudes, which troubled others. Nay, it is probable that they deemed themselves honorable, on account of their affluence, knowledge, and wisdom; and despised the apostle and his friends, as mean and obscure persons. (Marg. Ref. f—l.—Notes, 2 Cor. 10:7—11. 11:1—6, 16—20.) Thus, while they lived in plenty, he and his companions in travel, and the other apostles in great measure, continued even "to that day," exposed to hunger and thirst: they often wanted even suitable raiment to appear in before their auditories: they were buffeted with contempt and cruelty; they wandered about without any settled habitation; and they earned their mean and scanty subsistence by the labor of their own hands. (Marg. Ref. m—p.—Notes, 9:6. Acts 20:32—35. 2 Cor. 11:21—27. 12:7—15. Phil. 4:10—13. 1 Thes. 3:6—10. 2 Tim. 4:9—13.) Yet, when they were reviled, they blessed and prayed for those who reproached them: they endured persecution patiently; they returned humble intreaties for slander and defamation. (Marg. Ref. q—s.) But, while thus rendering good for evil, they were treated as the "filth of the world," and the refuse and scum of the earth, even to that very time: they were considered as below contempt, or as worthy of execration, as pestilences and nuisances, who ought to be extirpated and purged out of society; as the common sewer carries away the filth and off-scouring of the city, to prevent infection and disease. (Notes, Lam. 3:45. Acts 22:22—30. 24:1—9.) Some understand the words of certain human victims, peculiarly mean and vile, whom the idolaters used to offer to the infernal gods, with vehement expressions of abhorrence and execration.

16 Wherefore I beseech you, <sup>b</sup> be ye followers of me.

17 For this cause have <sup>c</sup> I sent unto you Timothy, <sup>d</sup> who is my beloved son, and <sup>e</sup> faithful in the Lord, who shall bring you into remembrance of <sup>f</sup> my ways which be in Christ, as I teach every where in every church.

Note.—The apostle assured the Corinthians, that he did not thus state his distresses as contrasted with their prosperity and fulness, in order to put them to shame for neglecting him, and adding to his troubles: but he affectionately warned them, as his beloved children, that their ambition, carnal security, attachment to false teachers, and lamentable divisions, would expose them to great dangers and evils. For, "though they should have ten thousand instructors" to teach them religion, as school-masters are hired to educate other men's children; yet they would not find them endued with the disinterested, faithful, and prudent affection of a father; or entitled to the authority and honor due to a parent. This he regarded as his own character, spirit, and claim: for he had been the instrument of Christ Jesus, in their conversion to the faith, by successfully preaching the gospel to them. As therefore they were his children, he was tenderly solicitous for their welfare: and he must speak with authority as a parent, and had a right to their respectful obedience. (Marg. Ref. u—a.—Notes, 2 Cor. 12:14,15. 1 Thes. 2:1—12.) He, however, would rather beseech them in love, to be "followers of him," in preference to their new teachers; to adhere to the doctrines, regard the admonitions, obey the commands, and imitate the example, which he had given them. (Marg. Ref. b.—Note, 2 Cor. 6:11—13.)—For this purpose, not being at that time able to come himself, he had sent Timothy to them, who was his beloved son, converted by his ministry, resembling him in spirit and conduct, and faithful in the Lord, as "a steward of his mysteries." And Timothy, when he came, would recall to their remembrance the apostle's doctrines, and the regulations that he made in every church which he planted; that whatever had been put into disorder since he left Corinth, might be rectified before he came again. 19 But <sup>h</sup> I will come to you shortly, <sup>i</sup> if the Lord will, and will know, <sup>k</sup> not the speech of them which are puffed up, but the power.

21 What will ye? <sup>m</sup> shall I come unto you with a rod? or in love, <sup>n</sup> and in the spirit of meekness?

Note.—Some of the teachers and their adherents, at Corinth, were so puffed up with their imaginary importance and superiority, that they were confident the apostle would not venture to come among them, or attempt to intermeddle in their affairs. (Notes, 5:1—5. 16:5—9. 2 Cor. 1:15—24.) But he assured them that he fully intended to come, if the Lord would enable him: and then he would make trial, not of their oratory and admired eloquence, or "wisdom of words;" but of their power to support themselves, in opposition to his apostolical authority, and the miracles which he should perform in confirmation of it. For "the kingdom of God," was not set up in the world, or in men's hearts, by well-chosen words or eloquent harangues; but by "the power of God," exerted in working miracles to prove the divine original of the gospel, and especially in the efficacious operation of the Holy Spirit to convert the souls of men. (Marg. Ref. b—l.—Notes, 2 Cor. 10:1—11,17,18. 12:14,15. 13:1—10.) The Corinthians could not but know, that the apostle's testimony had been confirmed among them by miracles. Would they then choose that he should come to them, with the rod of correction, denouncing spiritual censures, and inflicting miraculous judgments on the refractory, as he had done on Elymas; and as Peter had done on Ananias and Sapphira? (Notes, 5:1—5. Acts 5:1—11. 13:6—12. 2 Cor. 13:1—4.) Or would they, that he should come to them in the spirit of tender love and meekness, to encourage, commend, and comfort them? This would depend on their conduct, in respect of those evils which he was about to specify; for if they were not remedied, he should be compelled to exercise a salutary severity on the offenders. ### PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

The ministers of Christ ought by all means to be as deeply sensible of the importance of their trust, as of the dignity of their office; that, as active and self-denying laborers, as well as “stewards of the mysteries of God,” they may be “faithful” to him and to his church; that they may disregard their own interest, indulgence, and reputation; and willingly endure reproach and suffering, for the honor of their Lord and the salvation of souls. Thus they should apply themselves with diligence, impartiality, boldness, and simplicity, to dispense “the mysteries of God,” and “rightly to divide the word of truth” among the people, according to their characters and conduct: (Note, 2 Tim. 2:14—18.) remembering, that faithfulness is indispensably requisite in a steward; and that every other qualification must be contemptible, in the eye of all competent judges, if this be wanting.—Christians also should learn to value ministers, not so much, in proportion to the brilliancy of their gifts, or their rank and station in the church, as their integrity and disinterested faithfulness: and those persons certainly offend the Lord, who slight such as are true to their trust; as they also do, who tempt them to be unfaithful, by flatteries, bribes, frowns, censures, or contempt. Indeed, it ought to be “the smallest matter” with us, to be judged of men, or blamed for that which God approves, even by those whom we most love: yet it requires a superior strength of faith and grace to be so totally indifferent to the opinion of others, as not to be influenced by it; and many are thus tempted to waver, or warp from the constancy of their testimony. (Notes, Acts 20:18—28. P. O. 13—31.) But men must be incompetent judges: nay, though we know more of ourselves, than any others can do of us, yet our own judgment is not to be depended on in respect of our faithfulness, any more than our own works in respect of our justification. We should therefore rely in this, as in all other things, on the Lord; beseeching him to preserve us from deceiving ourselves, and to plead our cause against unjust censures and suspicions: and, in respect of others, we should, in all doubtful matters, especially in respect of motives, refrain from passing judgment; waiting “till the Lord come.” (Note, Matt. 7:1—5.) Then every secret will be disclosed, every heart will be laid open, and all counsels manifested; every hypocrite will be unmasked, every slandered believer justified, and every faithful servant and steward applauded and rewarded. Waiting for that solemn season, and preparing to render our account; we should beware of thinking of ourselves or of others, “above what is written” in the word of God, and of being “puffed up for one against another;” lest we should despise those whom God will then honor, applaud those whose “hidden things of darkness” he will then disclose, or trust and glory in man instead of the Lord himself.—If we duly consider, what we are by nature and practice; who has made us in every respect to differ from others; and from whom we have received all our talents; we shall see no ground of “glorifying in ourselves” on any account, but rather of much shame and humiliation before God; even if, in some respects, we are distinguished from our brethren, and if we do not over-rate our endowments, which we very generally do. For our responsibility increases with our talents; and it is seldom, that our faithfulness and diligence increase proportionably.

V. 8—13.

Fallen man is most apt to count himself full, rich and honorable, when he is most blind, poor and naked; and many professors of the gospel, like glow-worms, in the dark shine most, as to their own opinion of themselves, when their real character is most obscure and doubtful. The absence of faithful ministers concurs with the smooth and enticing words of false teachers, to buoy them up in vain-confidence, and to lead them to admire the wisdom of avoiding the cross, of attempting to “serve God and mammon,” and of counting self-indulgence the summit of evangelical liberty. But such ministers, as most desire, and would most rejoice in, their real prosperity, will be the last to congratulate them on their admission into this ‘fool’s paradise;’ and they may know to what a precarious and carnal kingdom they are advanced, by their shyness towards those pastors who “will also reign with them,” if ever they are admitted into the kingdom of heaven.—They, whom God has most honored, have always been proportionably despised, hated, and abused by men; and their sufferings, even unto death, have made them an interesting spectacle to all the intelligent creation.—The consideration that so many eyes are upon us, when struggling with difficulties, or conflicting with temptation, should animate us to unconquerable constancy and patience; that holy angels and saints may rejoice, and that evil spirits and wicked men may be disappointed and confounded.—The wisest of men, the strongest believers, and the most honored of God’s ambassadors, have been thought “fools for Christ’s sake;” and treated as weak and contemptible, through bodily infirmities, poverty, and the mean appearance and accommodation connected with it, from want of worldly accomplishments, and because of an unpliant faithfulness to the souls of men. Yea, this has been the estimate made of them among Christians, and even their own converts, who have counted themselves “wise in Christ, strong, and honorable,” in exact proportion as they were inferior to those, whom they thus undervalued!—It is very instructive to reflect on the apostles, as invested with the highest rank and authority in the church, endued with miraculous powers, and conferring them on others evidently and extensively, and most eminent in holiness and usefulness: yet even to the end of their lives so entirely poor and destitute, as often to want the very necessaries of life; earning their bread by manual labor, and treated every where as mean, obscure, or execrable criminals, “the filth of the world, and the off-scouring of all things!” It would be useful to those, who imagine, that the credit of the ministry depends, in a great measure, on their making a creditable, or even a gentle, appearance, and who emulate the affluent in the expenses of their families, to meditate carefully on the subject before us; that they might be led to discern "a more excellent way," of maintaining the dignity of character, becoming the ministers of Him "who had not where to lay his head." If indeed superior rank in the church were now attended with apostolical distinctions alone, it would not so eagerly be pursued.—We ought not, however, to be cast down, if, in some small degree, we are conformed to the apostles, as to these things; and if we too should be counted "fools for Christ's sake," weak and despicable, even by professors of the gospel. Though unable to live and appear like our wealthy hearers, (and surely we should not desire to do it,) we do not generally want wholesome food, decent raiment, or comfortable habitations: and, if in some very rare instances, a faithful minister be so entirely destitute, it is commonly the reproach of the people, rather than any disparagement to him.—We should however persist in blessing, intreating, and being kind to, our calumniators and persecutors; and if we should be unable "to overcome evil with good," but still be treated with contempt and abhorrence, we may recollect that far better men than we are have been thus vilified.

V. 14—21.

It is peculiarly distressing, when a faithful minister sees his spiritual children turn away from him, with disdain and aversion: but, let such as experience this heavy yet common affliction, remember that St. Paul continually experienced the same: let him not then be bowed down with discouragement.—No man indeed should be followed further than he "follows Christ:" yet believers should remember that a peculiar regard is due to those, whom God hath honored as the instruments of their regeneration; that it is very criminal to despise or grieve those hearty friends, who feel a real parental affection for them; and that those instructors are commonly influenced by selfish or party-motives, who want to draw them off, on frivolous pretences, from the affectionate care and faithful ministry, of "their fathers in Christ, who have begotten them by the gospel." We ought, however, to persevere in attempting to do good to those, who are thus turned from us, or against us: and it may be useful to put them in remembrance of those things, which they have formerly learned, but seem to have forgotten. We should imitate the tenderness of wise and good parents, who are not easily induced to forego all care, even of their disobedient children; but who know how to employ rebukes and corrections, as well as the language of "love and the spirit of meekness."—The kingdom of God is not set up, or supported, by florid metaphors or well-turned periods, but by a divine power; and they are the most eminent ministers, not who speak most gracefully, but by whom God works most powerfully.—Spiritual censures, and scriptural warnings, are greatly to be feared, though not followed at present by sensible temporal judgments: and they who are so self-confident as to despise them, are most likely to experience their dreadful effects.

CHAP. V.

The apostle sharply reprobates a scandalous incest, protected from censure, in the church at Corinth, 1, 2. By the authority of Christ he orders the excommunication of the incestuous person, 3—5. He shows that the remission of sin must be urged out, in order to keep the true "passover," by faith in Christ, 6—8. Scandalous professors of Christianity must be shunned, more decidedly than those without, 9—13.

I<sup>t</sup> is <sup>a</sup> reported commonly that there is <sup>b</sup> fornication among you, <sup>c</sup> and such fornication as is not so much as named among the Gentiles, <sup>d</sup> that one should have his father's wife.

2 And <sup>e</sup> ye are puffed up, and have not rather <sup>f</sup> mourned, that he that hath done this deed <sup>g</sup> might be taken away from among you.

3 For I verily, <sup>h</sup> as absent in body, but present in spirit, have * judged already, as though I were present, concerning him that hath so done this deed;

4 In <sup>i</sup> the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, <sup>k</sup> when ye are gathered together, and my spirit, with the power of our Lord Jesus Christ,

5 To <sup>l</sup> deliver such an one unto Satan for the destruction of the flesh, <sup>m</sup> that the spirit may be saved in <sup>n</sup> the day of the Lord Jesus.

Note.—After the preceding introductory statements and intimations, the apostle next proceeded to animadvert directly on the most flagrant abuse, which was connived at by the Corinthians. Incest with near relations was a crime, which the law-givers, moralists, and even poets in general, among the Gentiles, never named without the most indignant detestation: yet it was well known and "commonly reported," that a member of the church at Corinth, lived with his mother-in-law as his wife, probably while his father was still living! (Marg. Ref. a—d.—Note, 2 Cor. 7:12.) But though so scandalous a wickedness had been committed, and escaped censure among them; they were "puffed up" with a vain conceit of gifts and superior attainments, and were not ashamed of it, or concerned about it. Probably, the guilty person was of considerable rank among them, and a zealous adherent of the popular teachers: so that a party-spirit, and a most erroneous notion of Christian liberty, secured him from the censure of the church. But if the Corinthians in general had been in a truly Christian frame of mind, they would have "mourned over" such an enormity; and humbled themselves before God, with earnest prayers, intreating him to remove all obstacles, that he who had done this nefarious deed might be separated from their company. (Marg. Ref. e—g.) For, though the apostle was absent, and could not therefore exert himself as he would otherwise have done; and though he was aware that his peremptory interference would give great offence to many: yet, "being present in spirit," having the whole affair clearly before his mind, (perhaps by a supernatural revelation by the Holy Spirit,) and being full of zeal for the honor of Christ and the welfare of the church; he had already determined in the case, and had passed sentence on the criminal as if upon the spot. He therefore charged them in the name, by the authority, and for the honor of Christ, that, when they met together as a church, they would consider the apostle as present in spirit among them, to ratify their sentence with his delegated authority, and to enforce it by the power of Christ; and thus to expel the incestuous person from their communion; that he might no longer be considered as a Christian, but as a heathen, a subject of Satan's kingdom. (Marg. Ref. h—l.—Note, Matt. 18:15—18.) Yet this was not to be done in hatred, or for his ruin; but in hopes that it would be the means of bringing him to repentance, and the mortification of his fleshly lusts, that so, "his soul might be saved in the day of Christ," and with fervent prayers, that this might prove the happy event. (Marg. Ref. m, n.—Note, 2 Thes. 3:14,15.) Probably, the apostle expected, that this solemn sentence of excommunication would be attended by some miraculous infliction of pain and disease, to the wasting, or even the death, of his body: (Notes, 11:29—34. 2 Cor. 2:5—11. 1 Tim. 1:18—20.) yet by "delivering him over to Satan," he seems to intend his expulsion from the visible kingdom of Christ into that of the devil; and not that Satan would inflict the correction which might follow. No doubt, evil spirits are able and willing to disorder the body, or distract the mind, or destroy life, if God permit: yet it is far more reasonable to think, that God by miracle directly inflicted the disease, than that he merely permitted Satan to do it. It should however be noted, that when supernatural visitations do not accompany ecclesiastical censures; no temporal pains and penalties, of whatever sort, ought to be annexed to them. Unwarranted severities in this respect have made way for the disuse, or relaxation, of salutary discipline, throughout a great part of the Christian church; the extensively injurious effects of which can never be enough lamented, or indeed fully conceived by those who have not deeply considered the subject.—'A mother-in-law marries her son-in-law, with no favorable auspices, by no authority! Oh, incredible wickedness! and unheard of through life, except in this one instance.' *Cicero. (Notes, Lev. 18:6—17. 20:10—19, v. 11. 6 Your °glorying is not good. Know ye not that <sup>p</sup>a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump?

8 Therefore <sup>t</sup>let us keep the †feast, <sup>u</sup>not with old leaven, <sup>x</sup>neither with the leaven of malice and wickedness; <sup>y</sup>but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—It was evident, that the Corinthians had no reason to glory in their eminence and prosperity: for their connivance at the gross wickedness before mentioned was alone sufficient to prove, that pure religion had greatly declined among them. (Notes, 1—5. 4:6—8.) What! did they not know, that "a little leaven" would soon ferment "the whole lump" of dough? And that corrupt principles and examples, if connived at, would diffuse their baleful efficacy through the whole church? (Note, Matt. 13:33.) The judgment and principles of men would thus be corrupted, their conduct would grow more and more relaxed and even licentious, and they would altogether become a scandalous community. (Marg. Ref. o, p.—Notes, 15:31—34. Heb. 12:15—17.) As the Jews therefore used to search with candles in every corner of their houses, that they might cast out all the leaven, before they made the unleavened bread for the passover; so, ought they to purge out such crimes and offenders. (Note, Ex. 13:3—7.) Evils of the kind referred to, though in some respects congenial with their old state of idolatry, were utterly inconsistent with the purity of a Christian church; which should be "a new lump;" the members of which should resemble the unleavened bread used at the passover. (Marg. Ref. q, r.—Notes, Eph. 4:17—19. 5:8—14. 1 Thes. 5:4—11. 1 Pet. 4:3—5.) The Jews, indeed, had only the type and shadow of good things to come, in their appointed feast: but Christ himself, the true "Passover, had been sacrificed" for his people, to atone for their sins, and to be the spiritual sustenance of their souls. It behoved them therefore to "keep the feast, not with the old leaven" of heathen licentiousness, nor yet with "the leaven of malice," ambition, and contention; but with that simplicity and sincerity of repentance and holy obedience, which were the truth and substance shadowed forth by the unleavened bread. (Marg. Ref. s—y.—Notes, Ex. 12:3—16. Matt. 16:5—12.) This might either be applied to the habitual feast of communion with God, by faith in Christ, or to their commemorating his death in the Lord's supper: and it included both personal purity, and the purity of the religious society.—Some expositors confidently maintain, that the incestuous person was one of the teachers who opposed the apostle; or the opposing teacher, supposing, that the apostle had a single false teacher in his mind. But in the second epistle, where he directs the Corinthians to comfort the incestuous person, as brought to deep repentance, and as in danger of being “swallowed up of over much sorrow;” he speaks of “false apostles, ministers of Satan, transformed into the ministers of righteousness,” in a manner which wholly subverts this supposition. Note.—Probably, the apostle had in some previous epistle, which has not been preserved, warned the Corinthians not to associate with fornicators, or persons who were known to live in any kind of lewdness. (Marg. Ref. z.) Some expositors indeed are of opinion, that the apostle did not refer to any epistle, which he had before written; but to what he had enforced in the preceding verses of this chapter. But this certainly is not the most obvious meaning of the passage. And why should we suppose, that all his letters, any more than all his sermons, must be preserved as a part of the sacred volume? (Notes, John 21:24,25. Col. 4:15,16.)

Can it be thought probable, on reflection, that this zealous apostle, so admirably qualified to give epistolary instruction, who lay so long in prison, and was, in various ways, so much kept at a distance from his friends and children, should in the course of his whole ministry, write no more letters, than are now extant?—However this may be, he did not mean to prohibit all intercourse with fornicators, or with covetous men, or with such as oppressed the poor by iniquitous exactions, or even with idolaters, provided they were not professed Christians: for so extremely general were these crimes, that such a prohibition would be equivalent to a command, to leave their families and occupations, and to become hermits and recluses; which would by no means be for their good, or for the honor of God. (Marg. Ref. a—c.—Notes and P. O. Matt. 5:13—16.) He would therefore now more explicitly say, that if one, “called a brother,” a member of the Christian church, was guilty of fornication, or similar crimes, or of reviling, or intemperance; he ought not only to be excommunicated, but his society should be shunned as infectious by every believer: and they all ought to refuse even “to eat with him,” till he had given evidence of his sincere repentance. Thus the infection might be stopped, and the scandal prevented; and the most effectual method would be taken to convince offenders of their guilt and danger. (Marg. Ref. d—l.—Notes, Rom. 16:17—20. 2 Thes. 3:6—9,14,15. 3 John 9—12.)—The apostle did not think himself required, or authorized, to determine any thing concerning those, who were not professed Christians: but did it not belong to them, to exercise a judicial authority over the members of their own church, and to censure the scandalous? (Note, 6:1—6.) As for those “without,” they must be left to the judgment of God, who would not permit them to escape unpunished. Therefore, let the Corinthians proceed to do their duty, by “putting away from among them” this notorious offender, without regarding the displeasure which might be excited by it: otherwise, the apostle would be compelled to “come unto them with a rod,” and to exert his miraculous powers in inflicting punishments on them. (Note, 4:18—21, v. 21.)—As no mention is made of excommunicating the incestuous woman; it may be concluded, that she was not a professed Christian, but a heathen, one of those “without,” and perhaps specially meant. (Marg. Ref. m—q.)—Dr. Hammond, and some others, by learned criticisms, interpret almost all the words here used, of some kind or degree of lewdness. Thus “the covetous, the extortioners,” and even “the railers,” are supposed to mean debauched or licentious characters: as if “covetousness, extortion, and reviling” were not totally inconsistent with Christianity; (Note, 6:9—11.) or as if such a writer, as St. Paul, would have needlessly accumulated words, in speaking of one species of wickedness; and

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

How grievous is it, that those crimes should sometimes be notoriously committed by professors of the gospel, which heathens would be ashamed of! “Woe be to the world because of offences!” And “woe be to them by whom the offences come!” yea, to those also by whom they are connived at! (Note, Matt. 18:7—9.)—Spiritual pride, ambition, and false doctrines and teachers, directly tend to introduce and perpetuate these scandals: for men’s gifts, influence, notions, and connexions are, in such circumstances, more regarded than their conduct. So that, religious societies, as well as individuals, are generally most “puffed up,” when they have most need to be ashamed and to mourn: (Notes, Rev. 3:14—17. P. O. 14—22.) and sometimes those men are gloried in, especially when eminent in gifts and affluence, who must be taken away, as mortified limbs, before the church can prosper in vital godliness. When a man has wisdom, zeal, and love, he can have but one judgment in cases of this kind: and if he possess authority or influence, he will use it, whether present or absent, in exciting those who are more immediately concerned, to prefer the honor of the gospel to every personal or party interest; to venture all consequences in bearing testimony against scandalous crimes; and to separate from among them those who have done such deeds.—It is indeed highly desirable, that all the ministers and churches of Christ were enabled to exercise this salutary discipline, in the name and by the authority of their Lord; and to deliver over into the visible kingdom of Satan, all who evidently disgrace their profession: and that those, who have such discipline among them, should uniformly exercise it with exact impartiality, not respecting persons, and with due solemnity and tender compassion to the souls of offenders. But alas! it hath been so generally perverted by men’s carnal passions, or rendered inefficient by family-connexions, secular motives, and party-influence, and an undue regard to the rich above the poor; that a more complete revival of pure and spiritual religion seems necessary, before it can produce its full effect. Far more, however, might be done in most places than now is; if fear of man, respect of persons, and carnal policy, did not deter those concerned, from decidedly acting according to their judgment. But alas! many even glory in their prosperous state, when evils greatly prevail, which fully authorize us to say, “Your glorying is not good.” Few seem sufficiently aware, that “a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump;” and that the honor and success of the gospel, and the flourishing of the church, requires that “the old leaven” be diligently sought out and purged away; though the numbers and wealth of the society should be greatly diminished by it: and that no one should be considered as a part of the true church, who does not appear to have renounced and mortified his old sins; that thus the whole company may be a new and unleavened mass. (Notes, Luke 14:25—27. John 15:2. 2 Tim. 2:14—19. 2 Pet. 2:1—3.) So far is the sacrifice of “Christ our Passover,” from rendering this personal and public sanctification unnecessary; that it furnishes the most cogent reasons and effectual motives and assistances for it; else we can neither live by faith in him, nor join in his ordinances with comfort and profit. This feast cannot be solemnized, these provisions cannot be relished, along with “the old leaven” of sensual indulgence, or that “of malice and wickedness;” but must be attended with “the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth.” Yet, alas! festivals observed in commemoration of the great events, on which all our hopes depend, are very generally celebrated with “the old leaven,” and the leaven of wickedness in varied forms.

V. 9—13.

When individuals, who “mourn over” those who have done evil, cannot prevail to have them put away from among them; they should refuse to associate with them, and protest against their scandals by withdrawing from them: and, though we ought not to be severe on the infirmities, or even the occasional falls, of such as are humbled for them; yet when any one, who professes the gospel, is “a fornicator, or covetous, or a railer, or a drunkard, or an extortioner,” charity itself, the love of men, and the best, the eternal interests even of the offender himself, require of us to avoid all fellowship with him, even more than we do with persons guilty of similar crimes, who make no profession of religion; lest we should appear to allow of his sins, because he is of our party and sentiments. But how grievous is it, that we “must needs” still “go out of the world,” (though called Christian,) if we should resolutely refuse all intercourse with such characters as are here described! So prevalent is vice on every side. We must, however, leave “those that are without,” and who are strangers or enemies to the doctrines of grace, to the judgment of God. We should first judge ourselves, and take heed to give no offence to others: then we should shun such professors of the gospel as would be an offence to us, and a reproach to the cause: and thus attending to our own duty in this respect, we should wait and pray for times of greater purity in the church of God.

CHAP. VI.

The Corinthians are reproved for going to law before heathen magistrates, instead of settling their differences among themselves, 1—6, and for selfishness and dishonesty, 7, 8. Neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor thieves, nor covetous persons, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor extortioners “shall inherit the kingdom of God,” 9, 10. Some of the Corinthians had been such, but they were “washed, and sanctified, and justified,” 11. All lawful things are not expedient, 12. Christians, whose bodies are the members of Christ, and the temple of the Holy Spirit, must flee fornication, as a sin against their own bodies, 13—14; that, as bought with a price, they may glorify God in body and soul, 20.

2 Do ye not know that <sup>d</sup>the saints shall judge the world? and if the world shall be judged by you, are ye unworthy to judge <sup>e</sup>the smallest matters?

3 Know ye not that we shall <sup>f</sup>judge angels? how much more things that <sup>g</sup>pertain to this life?

4 If then <sup>h</sup>ye have judgments of things pertaining to this life, set them to judge <sup>i</sup>who are least esteemed in the church.

5 I speak <sup>k</sup>to your shame. <sup>l</sup>Is it so, that there is not a wise man among you? no, not one that shall be able to judge between his brethren?

6 But <sup>m</sup>brother goeth to law with brother, and that before the unbelievers.

Note.—The apostle here keenly reproved another lamentable evil in the Corinthian church. He abruptly inquired, as a man in astonishment, whether any of them could venture to go to law with their brethren, before the heathen magistrates, who were unrighteous before God, and might be expected to be unjust judges in such matters. Surely, they ought to have decided all their differences, (if such indeed arose,) by the arbitration of “the saints,” the holy disciples of Christ. (Marg. Ref. a—c.—Note, Matt. 18:15—17. P. O. 15—22.) What! with all their superior knowledge, did they not know that believers, being first declared righteous and heirs of God, at the day of judgment will be assessors with Christ in judging the world, and will concur in the sentence denounced by him against the wicked? (Notes, Matt. 19:27, 28. Luke 22:28—30. Rev. 2:24—28. 3:20—22.) And if this honor was intended them, were they not worthy to be entrusted with the decision of such causes, as related only to the comparatively trifling concerns of this life? Indeed, even fallen angels, whose slaves they once were, and by whom they were long harassed, will be judged by them; and the punishment of those proud and malignant spirits will be embittered by this mortifying circumstance. (Marg. Ref. d—g.) If, then, the Corinthians had causes relative to secular matters, to be “judged” or decided on; they need not either take off the ministers of the gospel from their sacred employment, or select such as were qualified for other more arduous and important services: even brethren of inferior abilities and estimation in the church were competent for this office. At present, they acted in a manner very disgraceful to themselves: for, after having greatly gloried in their wisdom and gifts, there seemed to be “not so much as one wise man among them,” not one who could be trusted as an arbitrator between his brethren! So that disputes between Christians were carried before the unbelieving magistrates, who would thence naturally conclude them to be a selfish and litigious set of men. (Marg. Ref. k—m.) Doubtless, therefore, there was a great fault among them, which could not be palliated; their contests proved them carnal and selfish; this effect of them was exceedingly dishonorable to the gospel; and their connivance at these scandals proved, that the church was far from being in a flourishing state.—The Jews were allowed to settle matters of property among themselves, according to their own law; and Christians would perhaps have been permitted to exercise the same kind of authority over their own company: yet voluntary reference to arbitration seems rather to be intended.—The apostle is not treating ‘concerning the causes to be judged, between ‘believers and unbelievers, nor of the public ‘administration of justice; but of those differences which nothing hindered from being settled by private arbitration. ... If the Corinthians had been such as they ought to have been; ‘this question would have been superfluous: for ‘no one would have given his brother any occasion for litigation. ... To decide such matters ‘as these, they ought by no means to employ the ‘pastors, or teachers, or other rulers, of the ‘church, or the deacons; who were fully occupied in their sacred functions: but rather they ‘should choose some of those, (afterwards called ‘the laity,) who being less taken up in sacred ‘services, might be more at leisure to attend to ‘these secular concerns.’ Beza. (Note, Acts 6:2—6.)—If you still retain your secular judicatures, ‘you set them to be judges over you, who are ‘despised in the church.’ Whitby. This learned writer reads the clause interrogatively: “Do ye set them to judge, who are despised in the church?” That is, the heathen magistrates. But did the church avowedly despise those very magistrates, whom the apostles commanded them to honor and obey? Mr. Locke understands it of private persons not appointed to the magistracy: but it does not appear, that the original word was ever used in that sense. In fact, none of the interpretations above given considered as detached from local circumstances, are fully satisfactory: for the meanest Christian could not be despised, and set at nought, in the church; except as that church was corrupted. But may not the apostle refer to the vain glory and self-wisdom of the leading persons at Corinth; who would, by necessary consequence, despise such as were inferior to themselves, in knowledge, utterance, and spiritual gifts, in proportion as they exalted

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—(Note, 5:9—13.) The apostle here plainly declares his doubts, concerning the real conversion of some professed Christians at Corinth, seeing their conduct was so contrary to the precepts of God's word. What! did they not know that the unjust or dishonest should "not inherit the kingdom of God?" 'There is very great energy in these inquiries, when we consider that they were addressed to a people, who were puffed up with an imagination of their superiority to others in wisdom and knowledge. (Marg. Ref. q, r.—Notes, 1—6, 12—17. 4:8—13.)—If, however, they did not pay a proper regard to so plain and evident a truth, he must warn them not to "be deceived;" not to deceive themselves, or each other; and to take heed that Satan did not deceive them: for they would certainly find, that persons who lived in the practice of any of the vices and iniquities which he proceeded to enumerate, would be excluded from heaven at last, whatever their profession, gifts, or creed had been. (Marg. Ref. t—x.—Notes, Gal. 5:19—21. Eph. 5:5—7. Rev. 21:5—8. 22:14,15.)—The apostle did not, however, mean, that those who had been guilty of these or similar abominations were excluded from salvation; for even some of the true Christians at Corinth had been habitually criminal in many of these respects; and probably most of them in one or other of them. But then, they had been washed, not only by the water of baptism, but in "the Fountain opened for sin and uncleanness;" (Note, Zech. 13:1.) so that they were "sanctified" from the love and practice of sin, and to the love and service of God, by the operation of the Holy Spirit, as well as pardoned and justified by faith "in the name of the Lord Jesus." (Marg. Ref. z—c.—Notes, Ps. 51:1,2,7. Is. 1:16—20. Ez. 36:25—27. John 13:6—11. Eph. 5:22—27. Tit. 3:4—7. Rev. 1:4—6. 7:13—17.) Thus their character and conduct were changed, as well as their state: but if any one of them still practised these vices, he deceived himself, if he supposed himself to be an accepted believer. The arrangement of the expressions in the eleventh verse shows, that no argument can be drawn merely from that circumstance, in respect of controverted points of doctrine. 'Here 'is the figure called Hyperbaton: for we "are 'justified in the name of the Lord Jesus," and "'sanctified by the Spirit of our God." (So 'Philem. 5.) ... To be justified still signifies, '(in all Paul's epistles,) to be absolved from the 'guilt of sin, and approved as righteous, either 'at present, or before God's tribunal. And so, "'the name of Christ," when we are said to be 'justified by it, must signify, not the profession

14 And <sup>k</sup> God hath both raised up the Lord, and will also raise up us <sup>l</sup> by his own power.

15 Know ye not that <sup>m</sup> your bodies are the members of Christ? shall I then take the members of Christ, and make them the members of an harlot? <sup>n</sup> God forbid.

17 But <sup>q</sup> he that is joined unto the Lord is one spirit.

Note.—It is surprising that expositors should so generally speak of Judaizing teachers, as the authors of the divisions at Corinth: when their philosophising disposition, and their erroneous notions of Christian liberty, plainly show them to have been speculating Gentile converts, who ran into the opposite extreme, and introduced a specious system of antinomianism. As all meats might lawfully be eaten, the ceremonial law being no longer in force; (Notes, 8:7—13. 10:23—33. Rom. 14:2—4.) they were disposed to extend the same principle even to fornication, as if that too were only prohibited by the ceremonial law, or as if the moral law also had lost its force! (Note, Acts 15:19—21.) —This false principle, added to their heathen maxims and habits, seems to have made way for their connivance at the conduct of the incestuous person. (Note, 5:1—5.) Now, says the apostle, admitting the truth of this position, that "all things are lawful" to a Christian, which might be granted in respect of meats: yet "all things are not expedient" to him; that is, consistent with his real benefit, and that of his brethren or neighbors: so that even this liberty must be used under certain limitations. (Marg. Ref. d—f.—Notes, Rom. 14:13—23.) Moreover, a Christian should habituate all his natural inclinations to subjection; and not allow them, by unrestricted indulgence, even in lawful things, to obtain such a power over him, that he cannot refrain when it is requisite that he should. (Note, 9:24—27.) Indeed, all kinds of food were created for the support of the body, and for no other purpose; and the stomach and bowels were formed to receive, digest, and convert them into nourishment: yet both the meat and the body, in respect of its present subsistence, will soon be destroyed, according to the appointment of God. (Marg. Ref. g, h.—Note, Matt. 15:15—20.) But he did not form the body, to be employed in fornication, and the promiscuous intercourse of the sexes; which counteract, and, if universal, would entirely defeat, the design of the Creator, in making them male and female; namely, the increase of the human species, the proper training up of children, and all the comforts and advantages of relative and domestic life, as springing from honorable marriage. (Note, Gen. 2:24. P. O. Prov. 5:15—23.) But even this was a very subordinate end, for which their bodies were created: as they were "for the Lord," to be employed in his service; especially the bodies of believers were "for the Lord Jesus," to be "presented as living sacrifices" to him, and employed as instruments of righteousness to his glory: (Marg. Ref. i, k.—Notes, Rom. 6:12—19. 12:1.) and the Lord Jesus was appointed to be the Saviour, Proprietor, and happiness of the body as well as of the soul: for God had raised him up from the grave, as the earnest of the resurrection of all his people by his power, to glory and immortality. (Notes, Rom. 8:10, 11. 14:7—9. Phil. 3:20,21.) And did they not know that their bodies were thus members of Christ's mystical body, the church? (Notes, 12:12—26.) Was it then meet that the body of a believer, which stood in so high and honorable a relation to the Lord of glory, the incarnate Son of God, should be disgraced and abused by a base intercourse with a harlot? They ought to know, that this was to become one body, or flesh, with a licentious woman, by a most degrading and pernicious deviation from the original institution of marriage. Whereas, he that was united to the Lord was "one spirit" with him; this union was formed by the communication of the Holy Spirit, and was of a spiritual and sacred nature, comprising a conformity of 20 For † ye are bought with a price: therefore † glorify God in your body, and in your spirit, which are God's.

Note.—As fornication was so inconsistent with Christian holiness; and as the temptation of the Corinthians to it, from former bad habits, the example of their neighbors, and abundant opportunities, would be very many; they ought to "flee from it," as from an enemy whom they dared not to face; they should shun all incentives to it, and reject every thought of it, or solicitation to it, at once, and with prompt decision. (Marg. Ref. r.—Notes, 1 Tim. 6: 11,12. 2 Tim. 2:20—22.)—For it might further be observed, that other sins in general have their chief effect upon the mind, rather than on the body, and commonly injure others more immediately than the man himself: but lewd persons not only sin against God, their neighbors, and their own souls, but against their own bodies also; dishonoring and abusing them to the basest purposes, and bringing upon them the most painful, loathsome, and destructive diseases. Thus they, as it were, take their bodies, and, by an act of cruelty to themselves, and gradual suicide, present them for sacrifices to the filthiest demons. The case is the same, in some degree, in other kinds of sensual excess; but far more in respect of this vice than any other: as every one must know, who is acquainted with the horrible effects of lewdness in populous cities; and with the very great multitudes who are annually cut off, in early life, and in the most deplorable manner imaginable, by the various diseases, with which it has pleased God to show his abhorrence of it. (P. O. Prov. 2:10—22. 5:1—14. 6:16—35.)—Moreover, Christians ought to know, that their bodies were consecrated to be "the temples of the Holy Spirit, who dwelt in them," as the gift of the Father through the Son, to consecrate them to God, and prepare them for his glory; so that in this respect too they were no longer "their own," but the property of God the Spirit, who had taken possession of them as his holy habitation. (Marg. Ref. u, x.—Notes, 3:16,17. John 14:15—17. Rom. 8:10, 11. 2 Cor. 6:14—18. Eph. 2:19—22.) For they had been redeemed, from merited condemnation and hopeless slavery, by the atoning sacrifice of Christ; who, having thus "bought them with a price," had acquired for himself, and for the Father and the Spirit as One with him, a new and endearing right to them and their services, in addition to that which he had as their Creator. (Marg. Ref. y, z. 7:22,23. Notes, Acts 20:28. 2 Cor. 5:13—15. Tit. 2: 14. 1 Pet. 1:17—21. 2:9,10.) So that, being wholly and on every account the Lord's, they were bound to devote both body and soul to his glory, in every service to which he called them, and to make no other use of either body or soul, than was consistent with that holy and entire devotedness to God.—The language of this chapter is remarkable: "God," the Father, will "raise the bodies of believers by his own power." (14. Notes, John 5:24—29. Phil. 3: 20,21.) Their bodies are members of Christ, and for him, as he for them; his property, to be devoted to him, having been "bought with the price" of his blood. And they are also "the temples of the Holy Ghost," and thus his property, so that they are not their own, but God's, to glorify him. Does not all this demonstrate, that St. Paul considered the God, to whom Christians especially belonged, as subsisting in three divine persons, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, to each of whom he shows their peculiar relation? This accords with the form of baptism and benediction. (Notes, Matt. 28:19,20. 2 Cor. 13:14.)—"The question, "Know ye not this?" is repeated six times in this one chapter; which may seem to 'carry with it a just reproach to the Corinthians, who had got a new and better instructor than himself, in whom they so much gloried.' Locke.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

The high privileges and glorious prospects of believers should suggest arguments to them against sin, and for the practice of every duty: that so, a just sense of the dignity gratuitously bestowed on them, so mean and worthless in themselves, may render them superior to the debasing allurements of vice, and the love of worldly vanities. Surely, "the saints" of God, and the assessors of Christ in judgment on men and angels, should not so eagerly contend with each other about secular interests, as to make their appeal to those who are strangers to true religion! Surely, they are competent to decide such comparatively insignificant causes among themselves! If there were not "utterly a fault among them," disputes of this kind would rarely occur: and if at any time they became unavoidable, it would be easy to decide them by arbitration, were not professors of the gospel often too tenacious of their supposed right, in secular matters, and partial in their own cause: for real Christians, even of moderate abilities, might generally determine these matters with sufficient equity, if they were impartially set before them, and unreservedly left to their decision. It must, however, be a shame to any religious company, if there is no man among them so wise and faithful, that his brethren dare trust him to determine their secular differences. Indeed, law-suits with "those that are without" need seldom be had recourse to, if Christians were disinterested, and forbearing in due measure; and if they would, in all tolerable matters, suffer themselves to be defrauded and injured, for the sake of peace, and the credit of the gospel. (Note, Phil. 4:5-7.) But "brother" would never "go to law with brother before" human tribunals, if there were not a very great fault on one side, or on both; and much deliberation, counsel, prayer, and endeavor for accommodation should precede, before a man "dare" to enter upon so perilous and disgraceful a business. But alas! many, who are zealous for evangelical doctrines, not only refuse to bear and forgive injuries, but they "do wrong and defraud, and that their brethren!" Whether such men act in direct opposition to their consciences, or are misled by false principles; they should be reminded, that "the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God:" for no one, continuing an adulterer, a fornicator or licentious, a dishonest, covetous, fraudulent, drunken, or malicious man, can have either title to the holy habitation of God and his saints, or meetness for it. Numbers deceive themselves and others in these matters; but the thing is impracticable; and the hope of it, the grossest and most fatal presumption. As many, however, who are now true Christians, were once enslaved to these crimes; so they, who are now the most abandoned, may become Christians: but then they must be "washed, and sanctified, and justified, in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God." (Note, Tit. 3:3-7. P. O. 1-8.)

V. 12-20.

Satan takes advantage of men's ignorance, pride, and lusts, to drive them from one extreme to another. Thus, when they are led to renounce superstitious scruples, they run into inexpedient or even unlawful indulgences. But "the wisdom from above" teaches a man to guard against mistakes on each side; to abstain from "lawful" things when "inexpedient," when unprofitable or injurious to himself or others; and to exert an authority over his own inclinations, that he may not be "brought under the power of any" of them. This is a difficult lesson, but of the highest importance: and if we consider, how soon all animal pleasures, and our present life, will terminate; the reflection may teach us moderation in the most innocent gratifications, and arm us against temptations to such as are unlawful, or unseasonable, or immoderate. Our bodies should be considered, as "for the Lord," and be devoted to his service, that they may at length share his resurrection, and be made like to his glorious body. (Note, Phil. 3:20,21.) How degrading then, how base, how ungrateful, how sacrilegious, to make "the members of Christ the members of an harlot!" Or to defile the temple of the Holy Spirit, and to alienate the Lord's peculiar property, to the vile purposes of fornication! It is, however, needful to fortify our minds on every side, against these dangerous temptations, by which so many eminent men have been cast down, and shamefully overcome: (Notes, Judg. 16: 2 Sam. 11: 1 Kings 11:1-8. Neh. 13:23-30.) and in this view, even the horrid diseases incident to those, who thus "sin against their own bodies," may be profitably reflected upon, especially by the young and inexperienced; in order to caution them to flee from so destructive a vice, and to keep at the utmost distance from all its fascinating allurements. But nobler motives should animate the believer's soul: being united to Christ, "as one spirit," and bought with a price of inestimable value; he should consider himself as wholly the Lord's, by the most endearing and indissoluble ties; that, seeking all happiness in his favor, and liberty in his service, he may live wholly devoted to him, and may "glorify him in body and spirit, which are his."

Note.—It is evident that those who retained their regard to the apostle's authority at Corinth, had written to him desiring his decision of several questions, which had been started among them; and he here proceeded to answer their inquiries, especially respecting marriage. of fornication, others seem to have imbibed the sentiments of the Pythagoreans, or other philosophers; and to have deemed marriage itself inconsistent with Christian purity, or at least unfavorable to intellectual improvement. On the other hand, the Pharisees generally taught, that it was sinful for a man to live unmarried beyond his twentieth year; but at the same time, they laid down many frivolous and superstitious rules, concerning the conduct of married persons. In determining, therefore, this matter, the apostle first allowed, that, in many cases and circumstances, it might be profitable, or becoming, for a man to live unmarried, and might render him more useful to others; provided he were able and willing, to live with that entire chastity which the single life required. Nevertheless, "because of fornications," on account of those propensities which God originally, for wise reasons, implanted in human nature, and which man's sinfulness has rendered generally too predominant to be kept in absolute subjection; in order to prevent fornication, and every kind of lewdness, and to remove the temptation; "let every man have his own wife, and every woman her own husband." In all cases this was allowable; in very many it was far best that it should be so. (Marg. Ref. a—d.) Nor ought they to imagine it a virtue in them to live apart; or that it was even allowable for one of them to withdraw without the consent, or contrary to the inclinations, of the other: but in every respect, they should consider mutual compliance and affliction an incumbent duty; and the proper means of living in harmony and purity, and at a distance from temptation; remembering that they had an unalienable property in each other's person, in respect of all the purposes for which marriage was appointed. (Note, Ex. 21:7—11.) This places the husband and the wife entirely on the same ground; and as much forbids him to take another woman, as it does her to cohabit with another man: so that it is absolutely decisive against polygamy. (Notes, Matt. 19:7—9. Mark 10:2—12.)—Neither ought married persons to deprive each other of the appointed preservative against temptation: so that they ought not to separate, but "by consent," and that they might be at leisure for the spiritual exercises of fasting and prayer on special occasions: (Marg. Ref. g.—Notes, Ex. 19:10—15, v. 15. 1 Sam. 21:3—6.) and even this should not generally be for any long time; lest Satan should take advantage of their weakness, to harass and defile their minds by improper thoughts, or even to tempt them to unlawful actions.

8 I say therefore<sup>m</sup> to the unmarried and widows, it is good for them if they abide even as I.

9 But if they cannot contain,<sup>n</sup> let them marry: for it is better to marry than to burn.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The apostle stated the things, which have been considered, as what were allowable; but not as giving an absolute commandment. Men might use their own discretion about marrying; and married persons concerning their conduct in that state: provided they did not needlessly thwart each other's inclinations, do injustice to one another, or throw any temptation in their own or each other's way. For he could have desired, that all his Christian brethren had been as free from inquietude in that respect, as he himself was; that, if the glory of God and the circumstances in which they were placed required it, they might live unmarried with as much content as he did. Some think that he was a widower, but this is uncertain. We cannot suppose, that he wished marriage to cease among Christians; but only that every one might be enabled calmly to use his prudence in that respect, without being necessitated to marry, when otherwise it would not have been advisable. But the apostle knew, that his experience, in this matter, was not a rule for other men: as this superiority to the animal inclinations was a special gift of God, which he gave to one and not to another, as he saw good; and that in different proportions. (Notes, 4:6,7. Matt. 19:10—12, v. 12.) He would therefore remind unmarried persons, and such as had been left in widowhood, that their condition had many advantages, which rendered it good for them to abide in it: but, if any of them found that they could not obtain the gift of entire continence, it was allowable, and even incumbent on them to marry; as it would be far better for them, more holy in itself, and more becoming their Christian profession, to marry, than to be harassed with polluting temptations, and continually in danger

11 But and if she depart, let her remain unmarried, <sup>q</sup> or be reconciled to her husband: <sup>r</sup> and let not the husband put away his wife.

12 But to the rest <sup>s</sup> speak I, not the Lord: <sup>t</sup> If any brother hath a wife that believeth not, and she be pleased to dwell with him, let him not put her away.

13 And the woman which hath an husband that believeth not, and if he be pleased to dwell with her, let her not leave him.

14 For <sup>u</sup> the unbelieving husband is sanctified by the wife, and the unbelieving wife is sanctified by the husband: <sup>x</sup> else were your children unclean; but now are they holy.

Note.—As to married persons, the apostle did not counsel, but “command” them; and not by his own authority, but by that of Christ, that they should not separate from each other; which was common among the Gentiles, as well as the Jews, and that on very frivolous pretences. The wife must not leave her husband: or, if she had previously been separated from him, she must not marry again; rather, she ought to make every advance and concession, to bring about a reconciliation with him: and the same rules were to be observed by the husband. Doubtless, the exception is implied, which our Lord made, in the directions given by him in this particular. (Note, Matt. 5:31,32.)—Though he had not given express rules in the following cases; yet the apostle considered himself fully authorized to enjoin, that the Christian, who was married to an unbeliever, whether a heathen or a Jew, that chose to live with him notwithstanding this difference of religion, should not put her away; as the Jews, for reasons peculiar to their situation, were required to put away their heathen wives. (Marg. Ref. o, p.—Notes,

Ezra 10:) Christians, indeed, ought not to marry unbelievers: yet if that relation had been entered into, either before conversion, or through inattention to the rule, or by mistake: it would cause great confusion and scandal to dissolve it on that account. The same held good in respect of a Christian woman, who had an unbelieving husband, that chose to live with her.—Nor ought any person to suppose, that this union, as “one flesh” with unbelievers or idolaters in lawful marriage, was inconsistent with being “one spirit with the Lord,” as fornication had been declared to be: (Note, 6:12—17.) for the unbelieving husband or wife was “sanctified” to the believer, by the appointment and command of God; so that their marriage was holy and honorable. If this had not been so appointed, and if Christians had been commanded to put away their unbelieving partners, as the Jews did their idolatrous wives; the children of such marriages would have been accounted relatively “unclean,” and so excluded from baptism, even as those of the Jews in the above-mentioned case were from circumcision: but, on the contrary, they were accounted holy in the Christian churches, and thus admitted among them, as a part of the visible kingdom of God. (Marg. Ref. u, x.)—This exposition of the scripture before us has indeed been much controverted; and some have explained “holy,” or “unclean,” to mean legitimate, or illegitimate: but in all the places, where these words are found in scripture, there is not one which will admit of this sense. No doubt, the children of the heathen, who were lawfully married, were as legitimate as those of Christians; yet they were never said to be “holy.” Something more must be meant, by the believer “sanctifying” the unbelieving party, than merely legalizing their marriage; for that would have been valid and lawful, if both had been unbelievers: and the children would not really be more “holy,” in respect of their nature, if one parent was a believer, than if both were unbelievers. But as the word “unclean” is frequently used in a relative sense, denoting unfit to be admitted to God’s ordinances, and “holy” the contrary; as in this sense the male children of the Jews were “holy,” and so partakers of circumcision; while those of the Gentiles, and even such as had one idolatrous parent, were “unclean,” and excluded from circumcision: I cannot but conclude, after long attention to the subject, that the baptism of the infant-offspring of Christians is here evidently referred to, as at that time customary in the churches; and that the Corinthians knew, that this was not objected to, when only one parent was a Christian.—‘Hence then the argument for infant-baptism runs thus: If the holy seed among the Jews was therefore to be circumcised; and to be made federally holy by receiving the sign of the covenant, and being admitted into the number of God’s holy people; because they were born in sanctity, or were seminally holy; for “the root being holy, so are the branches also:” then, by like reason, the holy seed of Christians ought to be admitted to baptism,

Note.—The apostle further observed, that if the unbelieving wife, or husband, chose to depart, and to disannul the marriage according to the laws of the community; the believer was not required to act in opposition to it, or to be embarrassed, as if reduced to bondage by the preceding contract. Yet separations ought to be avoided, if this could be done: for God had called them to live "in peace" with all men, as far as possible; and therefore they ought so to act, that if a separation took place, no part of the blame should attach to the Christian. (Marg. Ref. y, z.) An union with an unbeliever indeed would occasion grief and trouble; yet that ought patiently to be endured: for how did the believing wife know, but that God would make use of her, as an instrument in the conversion and salvation of her unbelieving husband? or, how did the husband know, but he might thus become a blessing to his unbelieving wife; by his pious, affectionate, and exemplary behavior, edifying converse, and fervent prayers? (Marg. Ref. a.—Notes, Gen. 12:1—2. Jam. 5:19,20. 1 Pet. 3:1—4.) On the other hand, there was no positive assurance, that this would be the case; and therefore no special reason for opposing the dissolution of the marriage.—The fathers in general interpret this, as allowing the deserted person to marry again.—"Such a total and perpetual desertion must, (on this interpretation,) dissolve the matrimony, and render

'the deserting person as dead to the other. ... 'A brother or a sister is not enslaved, after all means of peace and reconciliation have been in vain attempted, and the unbeliever hath entered into another marriage, or rather hath dissolved the former by adultery; as may well be supposed of those heathens, who thus separated from their Christian mates. And this interpretation seems to be confirmed, from the former words, relating to the case of the believing wives and husbands; "if they depart, let them remain unmarried;" it being not to be supposed, that believers would dissolve the bond of matrimony by adultery. Therefore the apostle seems to grant this in the case of "unbelievers, departing from Christians on the account of their faith." Whitby.—Total and perpetual desertion, when accompanied by evident adultery in the deserting party, undoubtedly sets the other party at full liberty, according to the scriptural rule; for deserting a husband or wife to live with another man or woman, or in any way evidently adulterous, must as much dissolve the marriage, as a divorce explicitly given on account of adultery: and there is no restriction, in any part of the holy scriptures, laid on divorced persons, to inhibit them from marrying, though very many, imposed by human laws, are often spoken of, as if scriptural injunctions. (Notes, Matt. 19:1—9.)

20 Let every man <sup>h</sup> abide in the same calling wherein he was called.

the contrary, it was proper that every man should continue to serve God, by the improvement of those gifts which he had distributed to him, and in that situation in which he had called him. This was the general rule, which the apostle enjoined in all the churches. Thus, if a Jew or circumcised proselyte had been converted, let him not deny his circumcision; or refuse that regard to the ceremonial law, which might tend to conciliate his unbelieving brethren: but let not the uncircumcised convert submit to that abrogated ordinance, or at all take that yoke upon him. For, in fact, the difference was in itself immaterial, unless men placed dependence on these things; but obedience to the commandments of God was the great concern. While the Mosaic dispensation continued in force, it was proper that its requirements should be complied with; and it might be still expedient for the Jewish converts to pay some regard to them: but the Gentiles had nothing to do with them, and ought exclusively to regard the precepts of the moral law, and the institutions of Christ, from a principle of faith in him, and love to him. (Marg. Ref. b—e.)—It is obvious, that the apostle is not here speaking of the way of justification, but of the conduct of justified believers. (Marg. Ref. f, g.—Notes, Gal. 5:1—6. 6:15,16.) The three particulars, which here, and in the texts referred to, the apostle selects, in this connexion, should not be considered as existing separately. For he who is “a new creature” possesses “faith which worketh by love,” and this love constrains him to “keep the commandments of God.” (Notes, John 14:15—24. 2 Cor. 5:13—17.)—It was also advisable in general for every one to abide in that profession, trade, or station, in which the grace of God had called him to the knowledge of Christ; provided it were an honest employment. For the gospel would teach a man how to behave in any condition, and patiently to bear its inconveniences. If then any one had been converted in a state of slavery, (which was the common case of the servants in those days, that is, of a very large majority, in many cities and countries,) and he was the property of a heathen master; let him be less solicitous about his liberty, than about glorifying God in that trying situation. But, as it would frequently deprive him of religious advantages, especially that of meeting with his brethren on the Lord’s day, or at other times; and as it would expose him to many temptations; if he was able, or had a fair opportunity of obtaining his freedom, he would do well to embrace it. The converted slave, however, was called to the noblest liberty, as a freeman of Christ, and emancipated from Satan’s yoke; and the Christian, who enjoyed his outward liberty, should consider himself as “the servant of Christ,” his property, and bound to devote himself to him, and obey his will. (Notes, 6:18—20. John 8:30—36. 2 Cor. 5:13—15.) But as all Christians had been bought with an invaluable price, to be the Lord’s servants; they ought not, by choice, or from secular motives, to “become” the servants of men; because that would interfere with their devoted obedience to their common Lord.

Every man therefore ought contentedly to “abide with God,” by constantly performing the duties of that situation, in which he was converted to the faith of Christ.—Ministers were, at that time, entirely taken from among the converts to Christ in every church, most of whom had doubtless been previously employed in other occupations; and seminaries for educating men for this service were not then known: it is therefore evident that the apostle did not mean to forbid that change of employment; when it could be made advisedly, and on good grounds, as well as from proper motives: and in other respects his general rule might admit of some exceptions.—“They should ‘not change, upon a presumption, that Christianity gave them a new and peculiar liberty ‘so to do.’ Locke.—The context favors the supposition, that those changes, which some might be induced to make, from an erroneous judgment, in respect of their liberty or duty as Christians, was the primary object, which the apostle had in view: yet his general language seems to imply, that he meant to extend the rule to various other cases.—Dr. Whitby and some others explain the words, “Ye are bought with a price,” of those slaves, who had been charitably ransomed at the expense of their fellow Christians. But their fellow Christians obtained no property in them, by thus ransoming them, as Christ does by ransoming us: the advice is general, and not limited to these persons; and it is far more obvious to suppose that the apostle used this expression in the same sense, in which he had before employed it. (Marg. Ref. h—o.—Note, 6:18—20.)—Abide with God, &c. (24) “Neither deserting ‘his master upon pretence of being God’s servant, nor doing any thing against the laws of ‘God, in obedience to his master.’ Whitby. It may be added; ‘But serving God by faithfully, ‘diligently, and meekly serving his master, in ‘all things lawful.’ (*Marg. [Practical Observations.]

Note.—The apostle here resumes his former subject, with especial reference to those who had never been married: for he seems to use the word, rendered “virgins,” in this latitude, including both unmarried men and women. Christ had given no commandment in this matter, but had left them free to marry, or not, as they saw good; and the apostle had received no special revelation about it. He did not therefore speak authoritatively; but he gave them counsel, according to the spiritual judgment which he possessed, as one “who had obtained mercy to be faithful,” in his stewardship of the divine mysteries; for he ascribed his faithfulness to the compassion and mercy of God, by a very remarkable expression, “pitied of the Lord to be faithful.” (Marg. Ref. r, s.—Note, 4:1,2.)—Considering the unsettled state of the church, and the persecutions to which it was or might be exposed, he considered it becoming and advantageous for them to live unmarried; that they might be less encumbered in removing from city to city, and have fewer temptations to shrink from banishment, imprisonment, and death; and that they might be more disengaged, and ready for any service, which should be proposed to them, for “the furtherance of the gospel:” as their anxieties, occupations, attachments, and impediments would be fewer, in the single than in the married state. But if a man were either married, or contracted to a woman under promise of marriage, he ought by no means to attempt the violation of his engagements, in order to possess more liberty for the service of God: though the unmarried might be counselled to avail themselves of their advantages, and not to involve themselves in additional difficulties, during those distressing times. Yet if either man or woman should deem it best, all things considered, to marry; they would break no law of God, and ought not to be blamed for so doing. Indeed, they would probably have additional outward trouble and suffering: but the apostle would not insist on this, or censure their conduct as imprudent; lest he should deter some from marrying whose duty it was to marry, or lest he should give occasion to any of representing that state as unholy. (Marg. Ref. t.—Notes, 6—9. Jer. 16:2—4. Matt. 24:19,20. Luke 23:26—31.) ‘Here Esthūs takes care to add, that the apostle must be understood only ... of virgins, who were not under a vow of continence: ... And on 28. ... Both ‘which exceptions, seeing St. Paul, assisted by the Holy Spirit, thought not fit to add, we may presume that he knew nothing of that matter.’—Whitby.

Note.—In speaking on this subject, it was proper that Christians should be reminded of the shortness of life, and the transitory nature of earthly things, at all times. “The time is contracted, as to the remainder:” thus some render the words. Only a small remnant of life remains.—Or, “it remained” to be observed, that married persons should reflect how speedily their union must be dissolved, that they might sit loose to the satisfactions of that endeared relation, and be habitually prepared for a separation: that those who mourned any temporal loss, should moderate their grief; (Note, 1 Thes. 4:13—18.) that the prosperous and joyful also should repress and temper their rejoicing by more serious recollections; that those who were purchasing houses or lands should consider the uncertainty of their tenure, and not deem themselves owners of such fleeting possessions; and that those who were laying out worldly riches, or in any way using the gifts of Providence, should be careful not to abuse them, or to expect happiness from their pleasures and enjoyments: seeing “the fashion,” the whole scheme, form, and show, of this world, “was passing away,” as a pageant, or procession, through the street, and would soon vanish as a phantom. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 1 Pet. 4:7. 1 John 2:15—17.) So that the spirit of a pilgrim and traveller ought in all cases to be maintained.

32 But <sup>f</sup> I would have you without carefulness. <sup>g</sup> He that is unmarried careth for the things that belong to the Lord, how he may please the Lord:

33 But he that is married, <sup>h</sup> careth for the things that are of the world, <sup>i</sup> how he may please his wife.

34 There is difference also between a wife and a virgin: the unmarried woman <sup>k</sup> careth for the things of the Lord, that she may be holy <sup>l</sup> both in body and in spirit; but she that is married careth for the things of the world, how she may please her husband.

35 And this I speak for your own profit; <sup>m</sup> not that I may cast a snare upon you, but for that which is <sup>n</sup> comely, <sup>o</sup> and that ye may attend upon the Lord without distraction.

Note.—By the preceding counsel, the apostle intended to preserve believers from perplexing cares and anxieties, especially in that unsettled state of the church. For he was sensible, that an unmarried man, having grace proportioned to his state, and being enabled to live superior to its temptations, might wholly employ himself in contriving the best methods of serving and pleasing the Lord: and, not having the charge and expense of a family, he might employ his time, talents, and substance more entirely in promoting the glory of God, and the good of mankind; and be ready to travel to any part of the world for this purpose, if an opportunity presented itself. But the believer who was married, must needs employ more of his thoughts and time about secular concerns; that he might provide for his family, attend to its concerns, and render things agreeable and comfortable to his wife, whom he was commanded to love and cherish as his own flesh: (Note, Eph. 5:22—27.) and this would sometimes exclude him from several active services, to which he might otherwise have been competent.—The difference between a virgin and a married woman was of a similar nature: the former might wholly dedicate her time and thoughts, her body and soul, to the service of God, in following after holiness and in doing good: but the latter must be engaged in the business of the family, and in other duties of her station, according to the will of her husband, whom God had commanded her to obey.—(Note, 1 Pet. 3:1—7.) So that, though marriage was most suited to men and women in general; yet individuals, who desired peculiar advantages for progress in personal religion, and for doing good, might possess them in an unmarried life; and to such it might be good not to marry, even if the times had been more favorable. (Marg. Ref. f—l.)—This counsel of the apostle was far from warranting or persuading them to shut themselves up in convents, and thus to put the lighted candle under a bushel: on the contrary, it instructed them to “let their light shine before men;” by an uninterrupted series of active services, for the glory of God and the benefit of the world. (Note, Matt. 5:14—16.) Yet he only gave them this counsel for their profit; and would not by any means “cast a snare on them;” by persuading those to a single life, who had not a sufficient command over their own passions. He did not mean that this was required of them; but that in some cases it would be comely, and enable them to wait upon God in his ordinances and commandments, without having their thoughts or affections divided and distracted by other cares or attachments. (Marg. Ref. m—o.)

36 But if any man think that he becometh himself uncomely towards his virgin, if she pass <sup>p</sup> the flower of her age, <sup>q</sup> and need so require, let him do what he will, <sup>r</sup> he sinneth not: let them marry.

37 Nevertheless he that standeth steadfast in his heart, having no necessity, but hath power over his own will, and hath so decreed in his heart, that he will keep his virgin, doeth well.

38 So then, he that giveth her in marriage <sup>s</sup> doeth well; but he that giveth her not in marriage <sup>t</sup> doeth better.

Note.—Hitherto the apostle’s meaning has been evident; but these verses are not without difficulty. Some explain them of a man’s resolutely continuing in a single state; supposing the “necessity” mentioned, to be matter of personal consciousness, and not any thing arising from the conduct of another: but such a construction of the original is, by their own allowance, without example. Others would refer them to the case of a man, who had betrothed a virgin, and was in doubt whether he should complete the marriage: but “to marry” is not the same as “to give in marriage.” It seems therefore most obvious to explain the passage of a parent, or guardian, who had the charge of a virgin. If one thus circumstanced thought that he acted unsuitably, in letting the virgin live single, till she had passed the prime of her life; and if any attachment, or other circumstance, rendered it needful; let him determine as he saw good; or, as it may be rendered, “as she willeth,” without supposing it sinful to allow her to marry. But on the other hand, if a man was established in his judgment, that it was best for his daughter or ward to remain unmarried in those evil times; and if he saw "no necessity," from any thing in her behavior, disposition, or attachments, to deviate from his own inclinations respecting her, and he so "determined in his mind" to keep her unmarried, he "did well." So that the parent or guardian, who gave a virgin in marriage to a proper person, "did well," and was by no means to be blamed, though she might in consequence be exposed to additional difficulties, especially in those unsettled times; on which account, he who did not give his daughter or ward in marriage, did "better;" that is, he acted more for her real advantage, provided she were satisfied in the single state.

Note.—The law was still in force, which bound the wife to her husband as long as he lived; (Note, Rom. 7:1—4.) that is, except when legally divorced for a sufficient reason: but afterwards she might, without sin, marry any other man, provided he were a Christian, and, in the judgment of charity, a true believer. (Marg. Ref. v, x.—Notes, 5:9—13. 2 Cor. 6:14—18.) The apostle, however, judged that widows would be happier, if they continued unmarried, in the present state of the church; and, whatever some of the Corinthians might suppose, he considered himself as one guided by the Holy Spirit, in giving these counsels and instructions.—The language employed in several places of this chapter has led most expositors to conclude, that the apostle did not write by inspiration, in the particulars referred to: and doubtless these intimations, thus understood, would rather prove, than invalidate, his immediate inspiration in other parts of his writings. (Notes, 2 Sam. 7:1—4.) Yet there seems no sufficient ground for the distinction: sometimes he spoke by way of "permission," concerning what was allowable; sometimes by way of "counsel," concerning what was advisable; and at other times "by commandment," concerning what was absolutely binding on their consciences. But, in all this, he might be, and doubtless was, guided by the Spirit of inspiration: some things being expressly forbidden; others as expressly commanded; others allowed, as far as expedient or beneficial.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

That which is good in itself, may not always be best for a man, when every circumstance is weighed; and when all the variety of inward evils and outward temptations, connected with it, are duly considered: so that those things, which are good for one, must not so much as be recommended to another; because he is incapable of overcoming the difficulties and temptations to which they expose him. None indeed may be dispensed with in breaking the divine law: even this perfect rule leaves men at liberty to serve God in that way, which is most suited to their capacity and various circumstances; of which others are commonly incompetent judges. Thus, if they, who find advantages for serving God in the single state, imagine that all others might do the same; they show themselves to be ignorant of the situation of fallen man in this ensnaring world: for there is no doubt, but many, who from various motives live unmarried, know that doing this proves a great hindrance to them in respect of their souls; and are unable, or unwilling, to persevere in that kind of celibacy, which the apostle describes as "good." To prevent therefore the fatal effects of unchastity, and of the strong propensity of most men to it, it is generally "expedient," and always allowable, that "every man should have his own wife, and every woman her own husband." All restrictions of this allowance uniformly tend to licentiousness; and no tongue can express the mischiefs, which arise from covetous, licentious, and constrained celibacy.—Every part of the conduct of married persons also ought to be so regulated, as to render them agreeable to each other, and satisfied in the relation. (Notes, 1 Pet. 3:1—7.) Whatever therefore, on either side, tends to give Satan an opportunity of tempting the other party, to any of those evils, which marriage was instituted to prevent, or to render it ineffectual for any of those ends for which the Creator appointed it; must be highly criminal, under whatever specious pretence it may be done: and the offending party is answerable to God, for the consequences of the deviation from his commandments. For, not only adultery and polygamy are inconsistent with the duties of this relation, and with the mutual property of married persons in each other; but also, whatever is disobliging and tends to weaken the attachment, and to open the way, for either of them to look with greater satisfaction on another object.—Every thing in the Christian's conduct should be regulated, in subserviency to his communion with God. Abstinence, and abstraction from lawful indulgences, may for a time be greatly subservient to that end: yet, when carried beyond proper bounds, they often produce contrary effects, and give Satan peculiar advantages against us.—Those who, like the apostle, are enabled to live with purity and contentment in an unmarried state, should copy his example, by laying themselves out with double diligence to glorify God, and to be useful to mankind: they should also imitate his prudence and candor, in not prescribing his own conduct to others, as obligatory on them in this respect; or despising those who are not endued with the same gift; remembering that in this also God has "made them to differ." In counselling our brethren also we should use caution; lest by exciting a man to grasp at advantages, which are out of his reach, we should cast him into circumstances of insuperable temptation; urge him to that which is contrary to his duty; and dissuade him from what is best for him, and indeed incumbent on him: for, in such matters, no man is competent to judge for another, but every one must determine for himself; or rather, he should seek counsel from God how he ought to act.

V. 10—16.

It is the express commandment of God, that married persons should not separate from each other, if it can possibly be avoided; and that such as have separated, should endeavor to be reconciled, or else live single. It is also his will, that husbands and wives should be careful to please each other in lawful things, though it leave them less time for religious exercises, than they enjoyed in a single state. Even if a believer has been married to an unbeliever, either before conversion, or by inattention to the rule of the sacred word; the cross of that incongruous union must be patiently endured, and the duties of the relation cheerfully performed; that by kindness, by a good example, and by fervent prayers, the unbelieving party may be won over, and the immortal soul saved. Nor need any doubt, but that, even in this case, the marriage state is sanctified to them; and they may still hope that their children will be made partakers of the spiritual grace, as well as the outward sign of baptism, by means of their redoubled diligence to "bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord."—In every state and relation, we should remember that God has "called us to peace;" and that every thing should be done to promote domestic and social harmony, as far as truth and holiness will permit.

V. 17—24, 29—31.

It is proper that every man should walk with God, according to the gift distributed to him, and the duties of his station in the community. Believers ought not by any means to manifest an inconstant and unsettled temper. Even a disposition to change from one sect to another, on frivolous pretences, is frequently injurious and dishonorable; for these changes generally are as nothing, compared with that cheerful obedience to God's commandments, which both evidences our faith in Christ, and recommends his gospel to others.—So superior are a believer's privileges to all temporal things, that even the want of personal liberty, the most valuable of earthly blessings, should not much disquiet him: nor ought he to be careful about it, though called to serve God in a state of slavery. If "the Son of God has made him free" from sin and Satan, he has a far nobler liberty, even in bondage, than his unconverted master ever formed an idea of. The lowest condition of those, whom Christ has made free, is honorable; and, being "bought with a price," we are all his servants, and should abide with God in our proper place and work; well satisfied with his appointment, and not desirous of a change, unless a substantial reason can be given for it: nor ought a believer so to attach himself to any man, from secular motives, as to restrict himself as to his liberty in the service of God.—But, whatever our state or service may be, we should remember that "the time is short;" our temporal comforts and trials will soon be terminated; our season of preparation, or of usefulness, will speedily expire. (P. O. 1 Pet. 4:7-11.) Let us then study to sit loose to earthly satisfactions; to bear up under temporal sorrows; to be sober and considerate in prosperity, and cheerful in adversity; to deem heaven our sole inheritance; and "to use the things of the world, as not abusing them, seeing the fashion" of this vain world is passing away like a shadow. Thus we may be helped forward by them in our pilgrimage; kept out of the way of temptation; and enabled to serve God and our generation to better advantage, as we pass through the world to heaven.

V. 25—28, 32—40.

Those who have obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful, and who have most studied the word of God and human nature, will be the most candid and cautious in giving their judgment, or passing their censures: for whatever may be good in respect of present difficulties or peculiar circumstances; they know that marriage is honorable, and fornication is abominable, in all persons and circumstances. They will therefore be careful not to speak, as if marriage were sinful in any; and they will be peculiarly cautious not to throw a snare upon those that pay deference to their judgment. And though they foresee that others "will have trouble in the flesh," by marrying in certain circumstances, and might in some respects be happier in a single state: yet they will "spare" them, without attempting to restrict the liberty which God hath allowed, or condemning them for what they do conscientiously. They will only counsel them for their profit, and to what is comely, and that they may "serve God without distraction."—Great discretion is also needful for parents and guardians, in their conduct respecting young persons; that they do not, by laying down rules and making determinations, according to their own views of what is most for their interest, lead them into dangerous temptations: for it may be "doing well" to permit young persons to marry, if their attachments or inclinations lead that way; when otherwise it would be "doing better" to prevent them: as even apparent imprudence, and its troubles, are better than sin and its deplorable consequences. How absurd then must vows of celibacy and perpetual virginity be! especially in young persons, who are as yet incapable of forming a judgment for future years: and are probably induced to do it, by the plans of others concerning them, and those plans often formed from secular motives, and what is thought the most desirable way of settling the different branches of the family. The general consequence of them will be, either the violation of their vows; or a life spent amidst temptation and mental defilement; or still worse. This was man's policy. How different from the wisdom of God, even in this chapter; which contains in it more in favor of a single life, than all the rest of the scripture taken together does!

—Believers, when under no other restriction, should be sure, in contracting marriage, to remember the limitation made by the apostle, "only in the Lord." What miseries have many endured through the remnant of their lives; and what bad consequences have they entailed upon their families, by transgressing it, on one vain pretence or other! Let every one then beware in time, that they may not rashly take a step, which they may have cause deeply to bewail to the end of life.

CHAP. VIII.

In respect of things offered to idols; humble "love" is preferable to that "knowledge which puffeth up," 1-3. We know that idols are nothing; for we worship only one God, through one Lord and Mediator, 4-6: yet this knowledge, and the liberty connected with it, may be so used as to enfeeble or stumble weak believers, 7-11. In this case we sin against Christ, 12. The apostle would rather for ever abstain from meat, than stumble a weak brother, 13.

NOW as <sup>a</sup> touching things offered unto idols, we know that <sup>b</sup> we all have knowledge. <sup>c</sup> Knowledge puffeth up, <sup>d</sup> but charity edifieth.

2 And <sup>e</sup> if any man think that he knoweth any thing, he knoweth nothing yet as he ought to know.

3 But if any man <sup>f</sup> love God, the same <sup>g</sup> is known of him.

Note.—It is probable, that some of the Corinthians had proposed this question to the apostle; 'Is it lawful for Christians to eat the flesh of those animals, which had been sacrificed to idols?'—It was customary with the idolaters to feast on these oblations, both in the temples and in their own houses; and many of them were publicly sold in the markets. (Marg. Ref. a, b.—Note, 10:23—28.) On this flesh several of the Christians at Corinth feasted without scruple: declaring that they knew the idol to be a mere senseless log; and the supposed deity represented by it, a mere nonentity. This was, in some respects, taken from a misunderstanding of those scriptures, which speak of idols as vanity. (Notes, 10:18—22. Is. 44:9—11. Jer. 10:6—15.) They therefore imagined that it was an evidence of superior knowledge, to eat of such sacrifices, even in the very temples of the idols! Now, says the apostle, we know that all of us, who are acquainted with the gospel, have this kind and measure of knowledge: but we are also aware, that such speculations "puff up" those who indulge in them with a vain conceit of their superior abilities and attainments, and foster a haughty, self-sufficient, unteachable temper; which is diametrically opposite to genuine Christianity, and prevents a man from making any progress in spiritual and experimental knowledge and wisdom: whereas, holy affections, and love to God, to heavenly things, and to the brethren, prepare men for receiving further instruction, and tend to their edification; and to qualify them to edify others also. (Marg. Ref. c, d.—Notes, 13:4—7. Eph. 4:11—13.

Jam. 3:13—18.) If any one therefore presumed, that he knew any thing pre-eminently, and so despised warnings and instructions; he certainly knew nothing, in that holy, humble, and sanctifying manner, in which he ought to know God, and his truth and will. (Marg. Ref. e.—Notes, 3:18—23. 4:8. Matt. 18:1—4.) On the other hand, if any man really loved God, valued his favor, and sought his glory; he was thus evidenced to be "known" and approved of God. (Marg. Ref. f, g.—Notes, Ps. 1:4—6. Nah. 1:7,8. Matt. 7:21—23. John 10:14—18,26—31. Rom. 8:28—31. 11:1—6. Gal. 4:8—11. 2 Tim. 2:19.)

4 As concerning therefore the eating of those things that are offered in sacrifice unto idols, <sup>h</sup> we know that an idol is nothing in the world, and that <sup>i</sup> there is none other God but one.

5 For though there be <sup>k</sup> that are called gods, whether in heaven or in earth, (as there be gods many, and lords many,)

6 But to us there is but <sup>l</sup> one God, the Father, <sup>m</sup> of whom are all things, <sup>n</sup> and we <sup>o</sup> in him; <sup>p</sup> and one Lord Jesus Christ, by whom are all things, <sup>q</sup> and we by him.

Note.—In respect of the question proposed, it might be allowed, as well known among Christians, that an idol had no real existence, further than the senseless image, which specifically represented "nothing in the world." No such deities existed as those to whom the temples were consecrated; for indeed, there was "one true and living God, and no other than he." (Marg. Ref. i.—Mark 12:32.)—The Gentiles indeed had many gods, celestial, terrestrial, and infernal; superior and inferior; who were adored, either as independent gods, or as intermediate beings, appointed to authority, in distinct departments, by their supreme deity; and mediators, in some sense, between him and mankind. (Marg. Ref. h. k.)—But Christians knew, that there was but "one God, the Father; of whom," as the self-existent Author of all things, every creature proceeded, in whom all Christians had their spiritual life and happiness, and unto whom they were devoted: and "one Lord Jesus Christ," the appointed "Mediator between God and man," the Lord of his redeemed people, and of all things for their benefit; by whom all things at first were created, and by whom believers were redeemed and reconciled to God. (Marg. Ref. 1—p.—Note, 1 Tim. 2:5—7.)—The Lord Jesus cannot here be spoken of, in respect of his original nature, as if inferior to the Father; any more than in those texts, which more directly speak of his mediatorial Person, character, office, and authority. (Note, John 14:27, 28.) The One God, even the Father, signifies the Godhead, as the sole object of all religious worship: and the Lord Jesus Christ denotes the Person of Emmanuel, “God manifest in the flesh.” One with the Father and One with us, the appointed Mediator and Lord of all; through whom we come to the Father, and through whom the Father communicates all blessings to us, by the operations of the Holy Spirit. So that this passage proves, that Christ the Mediator is the Object of our worship, as One with the Father and the Spirit, in the unity of the Godhead; and as opposed to all others to whom divine adoration was rendered, or by whom it was claimed, or to whom it has since been abundantly and idolatrously rendered by professed Christians. (Note, Col. 2:18—20.)—“For thou only art ‘holy; thou only art the Lord; thou only, O ‘Christ, with the Holy Ghost, art most high in ‘the glory of God the Father.’ Communion Service. None essentially holy, no creature the object of worship, as Mediator, none else exalted, with the Holy Ghost, in the glory of “God the Father,” except Jesus Christ. (Notes, John 5:24—29. Phil. 2:9—11.) This, at the reformation, was a noble protest against the worship of saints and angels as mediators, by the Papists. The gentiles generally acknowledged one Supreme deity; but they surrounded him with such a group of inferior gods and demons, that he seemed lost, or neglected in the crowd. Thus it has been in the corrupted Christian church, in respect of “the One living and true God,” and the “One Mediator between God and man, the Man Christ Jesus.” Though acknowledged in words, they have been and are so surrounded by angels and saints, as mediators and objects of religious worship; that the peculiar honor both of the Father, and of Christ “the Head,” has been and still is given almost entirely to creatures.

Lords. (5) Kυριοι.—One Lord. (6) ‘Εις Κυριος. Luke 2:11. Acts 10:36. Eph. 4:5.

10 For if any man see thee <sup>y</sup>which hast knowledge <sup>z</sup>sit at meat in the idol’s temple,

12 But <sup>c</sup>when ye sin so against the brethren, and wound their weak conscience, <sup>d</sup>ye sin against Christ.

13 Wherefore, <sup>e</sup> if meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no flesh while the world standeth, lest I make my brother to offend.

Note.—Christians, who were matured in knowledge and judgment, knew indeed that an idol was the senseless representative of a nominal deity, which had no existence: and many of the Corinthians, being “puffed up,” with the groundless conceit of their own superior attainments, boasted of their own knowledge in this respect, and assigned it as the reason of their conduct, in partaking of the sacrifices, even in the temples of the idols. But, had there been no other reasons, why they should refrain from doing this, (Note, 10:18—22.) regard to their weaker brethren, should have sufficed. For, not every professed Christian, no, nor every true believer, had “that knowledge:” so that some of them, even to that time, ventured to eat of the idol sacrifices, who retained a superstitious regard to the supposed invisible object of worship. They had an impression upon their minds through an association of ideas not easily dissolved, that they were joining in an idolatrous sacrifice; and thus “their consciences being weak were defiled.” (Marg. Ref. r.) Now, for what object, in any measure adequate, did the Corinthians thus lead their brethren into temptation and sin? “Meat,” of whatever kind, “did not recommend them to God;” or give them any religious advantages above those who abstained from it, whether out of scruples of conscience, or regard to their brethren. They ought therefore to be far more cautious and circumspect, in using, what they considered as their liberty and privilege; and not to act in such a self-confident and imprudent manner, as tended to seduce those into sin, who were weak and unconfirmed in the faith. For if a person of this description saw a Christian, who had the reputation of superior knowledge, “sit at meat in the idol’s temple,” he would be led to follow his example; and induced to do that, which either brought on him the guilt of acting against the dictates of his own conscience, by eating while he doubted the lawfulness of so doing; or to commit real idolatry, through an erroneous conscience, thus emboldened to think, that it was not inconsistent with Christianity, to pay some degree of regard to those idols, which they had been used to worship. (Marg. Ref. s.)—The word, translated “emboldened,” is literally “edified:” (Marg.) and thus the apostle intimated, that, instead of edifying their weaker brethren, "in their most holy faith," by their example and endeavors; they were confirming them in the superstitious regard, which in some degree they still retained for idols; and even inducing them to join in those idolatrous rites, by which the worshippers had "fellowship with devils." (Marg. Ref. t.) Thus their knowledge, of which they made so ostentatious a display, directly tended to the ruin of "those for whom Christ died;" and, whatever might be the event, through the special grace of God preventing the fatal consequence, yet, by thus giving a wound, mortal in its nature, to a member of Christ's mystical body, they committed a very heinous sin against the Saviour himself, which would not pass without severe rebukes. (Marg. Ref. b. d.)—Notes, Ps. 51:4. Acts 9:3—6.) On this account, the apostle declared, that rather than thus "cause his weak brother to offend," or thus displease his gracious Lord, he would, to the end of his life, eat vegetables alone, and "taste flesh no more for ever." (Marg. Ref. e.)—The word rendered "weak" often means sick, or diseased: and some learned men explain these verses, not of a doubting conscience, but of an erroneous conscience: that is, not of one, who ate, though he doubted the lawfulness of so doing; but of one, who erroneously thought he might lawfully partake of the sacrifices, with some degree of regard to the idol, and in expectation of some advantage to himself or family. (Note, Rom. 14:19—23.) And indeed, considering the inveterate habits, of such as had been brought up, and perhaps grown old in idolatry, and likewise the corrupt state of the Corinthian church; it is not unlikely, that some professed Christians retained a hankering after their former usages; especially, as feasting with their neighbors and relations, on these occasions, would in part exempt them from reproach and persecution. The apostle, however, by "a weak brother," seems particularly to mean the man with a doubting conscience; not him with the erroneous one, at least, not exclusively.—The better. (8) Dr. Whitby, after endeavoring to refute the argument, which some drew from these verses, against conformity to the ceremonies of the church of England, because they doubted the lawfulness of so doing, makes the following important remark: "Nevertheless, this seemeth to press hard on them, who believe that the schism of such weak persons, will finally tend to their ruin, and render them exiles from the flock of Christ; and yet for things indifferent, will, in this dreadful sense, cause their weak brother to offend: ... since this they do, for that "which commends them not to God," which doing they "are not the better, or omitting they are not the worse" (8). For if schism and idolatry be equally damning sins, and equally "cause my brother to offend," and him to perish for whom "Christ died;" we are equally to take heed in both cases, lest our power to do the thing indifferent, become "a stumbling-block to the weak," or the erroneous in their judgment of these things. For let men imagine what other difference they please in the case, while the sad issue or event is in general the same, to wit, the perishing of my brother; and my power to have abstained from that, which through his erroneous conscience gave occasion to it, is the same, I fear the guilt will be the same." This cannot easily be answered, by those who think non-conformity a fatal schism, and yet require things allowedly indifferent as terms of conformity. (Note, Rom. 14:13—18, v. 14.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

Satan as effectually injures some men's souls, by tempting them to be proud of their intellectual powers, as he does those of others, by alluring them to the grossest sensualities. That knowledge, therefore, which puffeth up the possessor, and renders him self-confident, dogmatical, and unteachable, is as dangerous at least, as self-righteous pride; even though an exactly evangelical creed be the object of it; and they, who are elated, because they thus know much about the truth, "know nothing yet as they ought to know;" and need to be sent to school to learn the first rudiments of heavenly wisdom. (Notes, 1 Chr. 28:9. John 17:1—3. 2 Cor. 3:17, 18. 4:5, 6. 1 John 2:3—6. 5:20, 21.) For without holy affections and divine love, all human knowledge is worthless, and far beneath the attainments of apostate angels: but sanctifying affections, and humble grateful love, are not only evidences of the Lord's merciful acceptance, but are important steps to a good understanding in the way of 'godliness.' The proud speculator is probably at the top of his attainments: but the loving disciple, though comparatively ignorant, shall daily be edified and make progress in heavenly wisdom; so that he shall be abundantly enriched from the fulness of Christ.—While we steadily refuse all kinds and degrees of worship to the many, "who are called gods and lords," and to those saints and angels which anti-christianity hath devised for mediators; remembering, that "to us there is one God, even the Father, of whom are all things, and one Lord Jesus Christ, by whom are all things:" let us diligently examine whether we really come to God, by faith in the divine Saviour; and whether we be indeed spiritual worshippers of the living and true God, according to his holy word. (Notes, John 4:21—24. Eph. 2:14—18. Heb. 7:23—25. 10:19—22.)

V. 7-13.

If our evidence of conversion is clear and decisive, and our views distinct and satisfactory, let us bless God for the consolation; but let us not suppose that this measure of knowledge and assurance is vouchsafed to all believers; or that we are "better" in ourselves, or more beloved of God, than our weaker brethren, the younger children of the same family. Let us beware of self-preference on any pretence, and vain-glory, and self-indulgence, and of despising those who are disquieted by needless scruples; who, though less comfortable, may perhaps serve God more conscientiously and humbly than we do. (Notes, Rom. 14:2-12.)—Such Christians, as "have knowledge," should also beware of abusing their liberty, and of approaching to the verge, or "appearance, of evil;" lest by any means "this liberty of theirs" should prove "an occasion of stumbling others," and so of guilt to themselves. For, should a weak believer see one, who is reputed to have knowledge, sitting at some of those feasts, or in some of those places of public discourse, for which many plead; (about as plausibly as the Corinthians did in behalf of eating in the idol's temple;) might he not be tempted to do the same, though contrary to the convictions of his own conscience? and thus, through this man's proud knowledge and carnal self-indulgence, would the soul of a weak believer "for whom Christ died," be endangered, and his conscience wounded; nay, many who were hopefully inquiring after salvation, may be and doubtless are turned aside and utterly perish. How can men thus "sin against their brethren," and violate the law of love, without deeply offending Christ and endangering their own souls also? What evidence can they have of being true Christians, seeing they act in a manner, which is directly contrary to the spirit of the apostle, who would "have eaten no flesh to the end of life, rather than cause his weak brother to offend;" and to the mind of him, who shed his precious blood, and poured out his dying prayers, for his misguided murderers? (P. O. Rom. 14:13-23.)

CHAP. IX.

St. Paul asserts and proves his apostolical authority, 1-3; and shows that the ministers of the gospel have a right to marry; and, with their families, to be supported by the people, 4-14; yet, he had not availed himself of this right; and had in many things waived the exercise of his liberty, in order to promote the salvation of souls, 15-23. Alluding to the conduct of the contenders in the public games, he proposes to them the example of his own exceeding earnestness in securing the incorruptible crown, 24-27.

a formal vindication of his conduct among the Corinthians; but he appears rather to have digressed a little from his main subject, in order to illustrate it by his own example, and in different ways; and accordingly he resumed and concluded it in the next chapter. (Notes, 8:7-13. 10:15-33.)—He had before declared his readiness to deny himself "the eating of flesh for ever," rather than "stumble his weak brethren;" and he here proceeded to show what he had actually done in this respect, to promote the gospel. But in order to state this clearly, it was necessary to prove his apostolical office, and that he had a right to a maintenance and other privileges in that character. He therefore inquired, "Am I not an apostle? Am I not free?" i. e. as well as the Corinthians, if he chose to exercise his liberty. Indeed he was aware that some of them would question his apostleship; but could they deny, that he had seen the Lord Jesus, who repeatedly appeared to him, that he might be an unexceptionable witness of his resurrection and glory? (Marg. Ref. a-c.—Notes, 15:3-11. Acts 9:3-7,17-22. 22:14-21.) And were not the Christians at Corinth "his work in the Lord;" who, by employing his ministry for their conversion, had affixed his own seal to Paul's apostolical commission? For he certainly would not thus have attested a direct imposture. So that they were the last persons, who ought to have made a doubt of this; being themselves the seal and demonstration of it. (Marg. Ref. d, e.—Notes, John 6:22-27. 2 Cor. 3:1-3.) This therefore might serve as a brief but sufficient answer to those, who examined him concerning the credentials of his commission.—Mine answer, &c. (3) 'Namely, what is said in the preceding verse; therefore this is improperly by some 'joined to the next verse. ... He adds this by 'the way, as if he had said, So far should you 'be from doubting of my apostleship; that I 'am used to answer those, who call that in 'question, by declaring what the Lord hath by 'me done among you.' Beza.

Note.—It being determined, that Paul was the apostle of Christ; (Note, 2 Cor. 11:1-6.) he next inquired, whether he had not an indisputable right to eat and drink at their expense; and whether he had not the liberty of marrying a believing woman, and of taking her along with him in his travels; receiving from the churches a maintenance for her and his family also. This several of the apostles did; especially Peter, 'the apostle of the circumcision,' who was attended by his wife, when he went to different places to preach the gospel.—The words "a sister, a wife," are so determinate, that they leave no doubt, that several of the apostles were married, and took their wives with them to those places, where they more staidly resided. To render them "a sister, a woman," as some do, would form an unmeaning tautology, or rather one calculated to mislead the reader: for, "a sister" must be a woman: and the latter word would be wholly redundant, if it were not intended to show in what relation she was supposed to stand; namely, that of "a wife," according to the general acceptance of the word.—(Marg. and Marg. Ref.) 'This declares in effect, that St. Peter continued to live with his wife after he became an apostle; and also that St. Peter had no rights as an apostle, which were not common to St. Paul. A remark utterly subversive of 'popery, if traced to its obvious consequences.' Doddridge.—Clemens of Alexandria not only saith, that he that marieth hath the apostles as examples, and that St. Peter carried his wife with him till his martyrdom: but confutes the enemies of matrimony from these words. '... Adding that they carried about their wives, not as wives, but as sisters, to minister to those who were mistresses of families, that so the doctrine of the Lord might, without any apprehension, or evil suspicions, enter into the apartments of the woman.' Whitby. The former part of this quotation shows what the records or traditions of the church in the second century were; the latter is a proof how soon antichristian notions about marriage began to prevail.

6 Or I only and <sup>n</sup> Barnabas, <sup>o</sup> have not we power to forbear working?

Note.—The apostle further inquired, whether he "and Barnabas" alone were excluded from the right of being supported, without earning their bread by labor. These two eminently useful servants of Christ were called to the apostolical office, after the ascension of Christ; and went forth together "to preach among the Gentiles." (Marg. Ref. n.—Notes, Acts 13:14.) The circumstances in which they found themselves, probably, led them to adopt the method of subsisting by their own manual labor, in order to promote the gospel; and they both persevered in it after they separated. (Note, Acts 15:36—41.) But the other apostles, beginning their ministry among the Jews, who had been used to support their teachers, were generally maintained by them without working; and were supplied when they journeyed to other places, where churches had not been planted. Thus Paul and Barnabas, by not requiring a support, seemed to have lost their right to one; and were generally left to labor, and struggle with difficulties and necessities, for want of adequate assistance.—This view of these verses renders their connexion with the foregoing chapter very clear. The apostle was preparing to show the Corinthians, how he waved the exercise of his liberty, in order to do good; that they might see, as in a glass, the impropriety of their selfish exercise of their liberty, "in eating the things offered unto idols." (Marg. Ref. o.—Notes, 13—18. 8:7—13. Acts 18:1—6. 20:32—35. 2 Cor. 11:1—6. 12:11—15.)

8 Say I these things <sup>t</sup> as a man? <sup>u</sup> or saith not the law the same also?

9 For it is written in the law of Moses, <sup>x</sup> Thou shalt not muzzle the mouth of the ox that treadeth out the corn. <sup>y</sup> Doth God take care for oxen?

10 Or saith he it altogether for our sakes? <sup>z</sup> For our sakes, no doubt, this is written; <sup>a</sup> that he that ploweth should plow in hope, and that he that thresheth in hope should be partaker of his hope.

12 If <sup>d</sup> others be partakers of this power over you, <sup>e</sup> are not we rather? <sup>f</sup> nevertheless we have not used this power; <sup>g</sup> but suffer all things, lest we should <sup>h</sup> hinder the gospel of Christ.

Note.—Had the Corinthians objected, as some suppose, that St. Paul, by not receiving a maintenance, seemed to allow that he was not an apostle; it would have been needless for him formally to prove himself entitled to it: but this was absolutely necessary, if he meant tacitly to instruct them by his example, to give up the self-indulgent exercise of their Christian liberty, or privilege, from love to their brethren. (Notes, 1—3. 8:7—13.) He first shows, that he, as well as other ministers of the gospel, had an equitable claim to a maintenance on the principles of natural justice: for who expected others to employ their time, strength, and skill in their service, without affording them a support? The soldier, when fighting for his country, being thus prevented from attending to his private concerns, had his charges borne by the state. The person, employed in planting a vineyard, was allowed a maintenance from its produce: and he who tended a flock used to eat the milk of the flock. (Marg. Ref. p—r.) Who then could think it equitable to refuse the ministers of religion, while "fighting the good fight of faith," laboring in the Lord's vine-

Ought not those who gave up other prospects of supporting themselves and their families, that they might, with great peril and hardship, promote the spiritual good of others, to be maintained in a decent and comfortable manner by them?—Chrysostom and Theophylact observe, that ‘he saith not, Who goeth to warfare, and is not rich? Who plants a vineyard, and heaps not up gold of the fruits of it? Who feeds a flock, and makes not a merchandise of the sheep? Teaching us, that the spiritual pastor should be content with little, and seek only ‘what is necessary, not what is superfluous.’ Whitby.—But was this merely the dictate of human reason? Verily the law gave an emblematical intimation of it, when it forbad the Israelites to muzzle the ox, which was employed in treading out the grain. (Deut. 25:4.)—If the ox must not be refused a share of that abundance, which men enjoyed through its labor; surely the laborious and patient minister should be supported by those, who received far richer blessings by his diligent and self-denying services. (Marg. Ref. s—x.—Notes, Hos. 10:9—11. 1 Tim. 5:17,18.) For could it be supposed, that God made such particular laws from a regard to oxen? He indeed required men to be merciful to the beasts, and his providential care and bounty extended to all creatures; yet doubtless this prohibition was entirely given for the sake of the human species; that none should receive his neighbor’s service without wages; and especially for the sake of ministers, that they should be supported in a suitable manner, as a recompense for their useful and affectionate labors. Thus, when endeavoring to propagate the gospel among the Gentiles, or when laboring, amidst great hardship and necessities, among unconverted persons, where no support could be expected, any more than the oxen had when plowing the ground; they might be encouraged, by the hope of future maintenance, to persevere in the work; and, when employed in furthering the joy and growth of believers, they might be partakers of the expected recompense, and have some refreshment and relief after their hardships, by a comfortable maintenance; as the oxen eat of the corn, when treading it out for the benefit of others. (Marg. Ref. z, a.) And indeed, if the ministers of Christ had sown the “spiritual” seed of the word of God, which was about to produce, for the benefit of the people, the excellent and permanent fruits of salvation; ought they to deem it a great matter, a large expense to themselves, or a great favor to their ministers, if they allowed them to reap a portion of “their carnal things;” which were of an earthly nature and could not long be preserved, and which would prove them also “carnal,” if they either tenaciously hoarded them, or luxuriously spent them on themselves?

(Marg. Ref. b, c.—Notes, Mal. 3:7—12. Rom. 15:22—29. Gal. 6:6—10.) If then other pastors, and even the false teachers at Corinth, had been allowed to partake of this privilege, or authority over them, much more was this due to the apostle and his helpers, who first preached the gospel among them. Nevertheless, they had not availed themselves of this undoubted right; but had chosen to endure unceasing labor, pinching want, and every extremity, “lest they should give any hindrance to the gospel of Christ,” and prevent its success. Yet after all, the Corinthians would not abridge themselves of the indulgence of a luxurious meal, out of love to their weaker brethren! This is evidently the contrast intended; and a most striking contrast it was. (Marg. Ref. d—h.—Notes, 2 Kings 5:15,16,20—25.)—Thou shalt not muzzle, &c. (9) Exactly from LXX.

13 Do ye not know, that <sup>i</sup> they which minister about holy things * live of the things of the temple? and they which wait at the altar are partakers with the altar?

14 Even so hath the Lord <sup>k</sup> ordained, that they which preach the gospel should live of the gospel.

15 But <sup>l</sup> I have used none of these things: <sup>m</sup> neither have I written these things, that it should be so done unto me: <sup>n</sup> for <sup>o</sup> it were better for me to die, than that any man should make my glorying void.

Note.—The apostle here adduced another proof of his right to a maintenance. The Christians at Corinth could not but know, that the priests and Levites, who attended on the worship of the temple, (and so spent their time in that service, as to be excluded from the inheritances and the employments with which the other Israelites supported themselves and their families,) were maintained from the tithes, first fruits, oblations, and sacrifices there presented: (Marg. Ref. i.—Notes, Num. 18: 20, 21. 35:2—8.) in like manner, the Lord Jesus had appointed, that the ministers of his gospel should be supported by the people, for their services in this sacred function, and not be obliged to engage in any other. (Note, Matt. 10:9,10.) Some expositors argue, from the apostle's frequent reference to the law, that the judaizing teachers were his chief opponents at Corinth. Yet the contrary is evident; and doubtless all professed Christians would soon become acquainted with the holy scriptures, and might properly be referred to them. Indeed the Old Testament is replete in every part with instructions to us at this day, though no one thinks of obeying the ceremonial law.—The Corinthians, however, well knew, that the apostle had not insisted on his right, in any of these things; nor did he thus write to them, in order to induce them to raise him an income: on the contrary, he deemed himself to have such a ground of glorying, (though not before God, yet before them,) in this self-denying, disinterested conduct, that he should account it more desirable to die even by want, or in any way, than by receiving support from them, to “render it void.” Probably, he had witnessed some things in the disposition of the Corinthian Christians, which first induced him to decline receiving any support from them. What had passed since he left them still more confirmed him in his purpose: he thought himself unkindly used by them, and in this way only would he show them his sense of their misconduct. (Notes, 2 Cor. 11:7—12. 12:11—21.) He knew that the false teachers wanted an occasion against him; but this disinterestedness gave him an advantage over them: and it was very important that his example should be contrasted with their conduct, which could not otherwise so properly have been done. Indeed, he had “nothing to glory in,” (though he had faithfully preached the gospel,) as peculiarly expressive of his zeal and love, and which he might oppose to the vain-glorious boasts of false teachers. For he had been called to this ministry in so singular a manner, that “a necessity was laid upon him,” and he could not decline the service, or execute it unfaithfully, without incurring the heaviest condemnation. If indeed he had, without an express command, (having previously embraced the gospel,) deliberately and willingly engaged in the work of the ministry, from love to Christ and to the souls of sinners, and zeal for the glory of God; he might have been assured of a gracious and abundant recompense. But, as he was so wonderfully arrested, when violently persecuting the church, and entrusted with a dispensation, or stewardship, without any previous choice or willingness; a line of conduct of a peculiar nature was requisite for him, in order to show that he was not actuated by slavish fear, or mercenary principles. (Note, Acts 9:1—22.) For, if this had been the case, where would have been his reward? (Marg. Ref. o—x.—Notes, Matt. 6:1—5,16—18.) Or, how could he, in his peculiar circumstances, distinguish himself from mercenary teachers, and thus have ground of glorying, through the grace of God, in this distinction? Or how might he possess the assurance of a gracious reward? Truly, by preaching the gospel freely, without putting his hearers to any expense; and by enduring poverty, hunger, and labor, rather than make an inexpedient and improper use of his liberty and privilege, as an apostle of Christ. Thus he evidenced that he acted from the genuine principles of zeal and love, and so enjoyed much comfort and assurance of hope in his own soul.—Let it here be carefully noted, that for ministers of religion to insist on their due, and use their liberty, when this hinders their usefulness, is to “abuse their power in the gospel.” (Note, 7:29—31.)

only one, in which the apostle thus denied himself. Though he "was free" from every obligation to comply with other men's inclinations, or to conform to their customs; yet he had voluntarily become as "a slave to all men," or to men of every nation, rank, or religious opinion; by renouncing all personal considerations, and bearing with their prejudices, mistakes, and infirmities, as far as he could consistently with his duty; in order that he might win over the more to the faith of Christ. (Marg. Ref. z—b.—Note, Prov. 11:30.) So that he conversed among the unconverted Jews, as though he had considered the Mosaic law to be still in force: thus he circumcised Timothy, that he might give them no offence; (Note, Acts 16: 1—3.) and he paid that regard to their rules, which consisted with his duty as the apostle of the Gentiles, without regarding the trouble and self-denial of so doing. By this conduct he endeavored to win upon them, to attend to his doctrine for their good. Even to the Jewish converts, who still deemed themselves under the authority of the ritual law, he became as one of them; and joined with them in their worship and purifications, as far as he could without misleading them; in order that he might soften their prejudices and be made useful to them. He likewise conversed as freely among the Gentiles, as if he had been unacquainted with the law of Moses, in order that he might win them over to embrace the gospel. (Marg. Ref. c—e.—Notes, Acts 21: 22—26. Gal. 2:11—16. 4:12—16.) He did not however disregard the authority and commands of God, but considered himself to be "under the law to Christ," bound to receive the moral law from his hand as a rule of duty; taught by his grace to love it and delight in it; and, as delivered from its curse, engaged by additional motives to yield a prompt obedience to it. (Marg. Ref. f.)—In like manner, he descended to the infirmities and scruples of "the weak" in faith, as if he too had been weak; abridging himself of his liberty, lest he should grieve or ensnare them; without making any ostentation of stronger faith or greater knowledge, or showing any neglect or contempt of them. (Notes, 8:7—13. 10:29—33. Rom. 15:1—3.) Thus, in every respect, in which he could do it with a good conscience, "he became all things to all men," by an habitual, cheerful, patient endurance of their infirmities, and toleration of their prejudices and mistakes in things unessential; that, by every means which he could devise, "he might save some," from each of the several descriptions of men among whom he labored. (Marg. Ref. g—i.—Note, 2 Tim. 2:8—13.) This he did from love to the gospel, and a valuation of its blessings; that he might be a partaker of them himself, and might also share them with numerous converts, and especially with the Corinthians; not being satisfied, as it were, to be saved himself, without he could prevail for the salvation of others also. (Marg. Ref. k, l.—Note, John 12:23—26.)—Nothing could be more suited to shame those whom he addressed out of a selfish use of their liberty, than this statement of his own principles and conduct; or more strongly mark the surprising change which had taken place in him, since the time, when, by cruel persecution, he aimed to make all the Christians every where conform to his own sentiments and practice, in the great concerns of religion.

27 But <sup>v</sup>I keep under my body, and bring it into subjection; <sup>w</sup>lest that by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should be <sup>x</sup>a cast-away.

Note.—To illustrate his subject, the apostle called the attention of the people to the Isthmian games, which were celebrated near Corinth. Did they not well know, that though several racers set out to run for the prize, yet it was awarded to the victorious person alone, and the rest were disappointed and in a measure disgraced? This induced each of them to exert himself to the utmost, in order to be successful. Let then the Corinthians do the same in their Christian course: let them run with earnestness, self-denial, and patience, without shrinking from hardships or perils, and without loitering, from attention to worldly allurements; that they might obtain the prize, which self-indulgent professors of Christianity would come short of. (Marg. Ref. n, o.—Notes, Phil. 3:12—14. Heb. 12:1.) They well knew, that every man, who contended in those athletic exercises, must prepare himself for them by rule, in respect of his diet, and all other things. This would, in many cases, require peculiar temperance, self-government, and self-denial, without which no one could expect to succeed. Now, they submitted to this for a garland of herbs, or evergreens, which would soon wither and decay, even as the honor annexed to them must be very transient: but Christians contended with the enemies of their salvation, in hopes of obtaining an "incorruptible crown of glory and felicity;" and surely they ought not to shrink from any self-denial or suffering. (Marg. Ref. p—r.—Note, 1 Pet. 1:3—5.) The apostle, as to himself, could truly say, that he did not so run in this race as to leave the event of it "uncertain," or as willing to be left among the undistinguished multitude of losers. Nor did he fight, as the pugilists used to exercise themselves, when their blows only beat the air, having no opponent to contend with; but as they did when actually engaged in the combat. Thus he got the better of his animal inclinations; as they used to subdue their antagonists, when by violent blows they beat them down to the ground, and kept them under till they yielded the victory. For he not only refused his appetites unlawful or inexpedient indulgences; but he habituated them to brook denial in every thing, when there was a call to it: and he injured his body to hard labor and patient sufferings; and thus wore it out, of which the marks and scars might be visible to every one. In this way he sought and possessed the assurance, that he should not, after having preached to others, (like the heralds who called the combatants to the conflict,) be himself rejected, as having no title to the incorruptible crown. (Marg. Ref. s—y.—Notes, Acts 20:22—24. 2 Tim. 4:6—8.)—This did not imply that the apostle doubted of his acceptance, or perseverance: but it showed the Corinthians the nature of his assurance, and forcibly cautioned them not to rest in such hopes, as were consistent with indiscriminate self-indulgence, even in things lawful. He had abundant occasions and methods of thus "keeping under his body, and bringing it into subjection," without using the tortures, austerities, and flagellations of the papists: while he willingly endured hunger, thirst, fatigue, and imprisonment, in preaching the gospel; and was frequently "in watchings, fastings," and prayers, as well as habitually temperate in all things. (Notes, 2 Cor. 6:3—10. 11:21—27.)—The apostle seems designedly to contrast the continence and temperance of the heathen combatants, for a fading crown, with the luxurious self-indulgence of the Corinthian Christians, whom no motives, either taken from the good of their brethren, their own spiritual advantage, or the honor of the gospel, could induce to deny themselves the gratification of a sensual feast.—"The body" seems here to be meant literally.—"The depraved nature," "the body of sin and death," must be crucified as a malefactor: (Notes, Rom. 6:5—7. 7:22—25. 8:12,13. Gal. 5:22—26.) but "the body," or animal frame, the exquisite workmanship of the great Creator, needs only by wholesome and sometimes sharp discipline to be brought under, and kept under, as a well educated child. The unsuccessful racers or pugilists in the public games at most were only exposed to some transient disgrace, while their other comforts remained to them: but in the Christian conflict, there is no alternative between the incorruptible crown, and everlasting shame and misery.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—18.

When the Lord hears the prayers of his ministers, and blesses their labors in the conversion of sinners, he sets his seal to their commission. This should satisfy conscientious ministers in respect of their own call to the work, and be deemed a sufficient proof to others, especially to those converted by them: though no occasional usefulness will prove an unwholy man to be a real Christian, or a self-confident boaster to be a "faithful steward of the mysteries of God."—However expedient the single life may be in some cases; yet marriage not only consists with the office of a stated pastor, but with that of a missionary, or an evangelist, as it did with that of the holy apostles, and is often highly expedient for them: and though ministers may see good, in some circumstances, to labor for their bread, they have an undoubted right to a decent maintenance for themselves and families; whether natural equity, or the word of God, be appealed to. They who judge it best "not to use this power," are the most proper persons to enforce the equity of it: as they may do it with less suspicion of wrong motives; and, as otherwise their conduct might be misconstrued to the disadvantage of their brethren. Nor ought they, who reap the spiritual benefit of the minister's labors, to yield a proportion of their temporal goods, as if it were an alms, or a great favor conferred on him: for it is at least as much his due, as the soldier's or the laborer's wages. How should it be expected that men will give up the prospect of lucrative employments, and creditable professions, to engage in this warfare, to "labor in the Lord's husbandry," or "to feed his flock;" if they cannot do it in hope of living by their profession? How can they face the dangers and endure the hardships of plowing up the fallow ground, by preaching to the ignorant, careless, and profligate; if pinching want be their only prospect, however diligent and successful they may be? Or how can they minister to the comfort and edification of believers; when they are burdened with debts, destitute of necessaries, surrounded by indigent families, compelled to place their children in unsuitable situations, or driven themselves into other employments for bread? How can they but suspect, that their hearers are deceiving themselves, in professing to love Christ and the gospel; while they enjoy plenty, and lay up for their children, yet leave their pastors to wear out their lives in distressing poverty?—Ministers have passions and feelings like other men; they find as much inward and outward opposition, to the exercise of faith, and hope, and patience, as their brethren, and commonly more: so that their spirits are often depressed, and their hands weakened on these accounts; when a regard to the real dignity of their office forbids them to complain, and induces them to suffer in silence and submission.—On the other hand, it behoves ministers to be as disinterested as possible: they had better “suffer all things,” and even lose their lives, than give reason to suspect that they act from love to “filthy lucre;” or that any should make “their glorying void,” when they avow that the love of Christ, and of souls, dictates their affectionate persuasions and solemn warnings. But if they, to whom “a dispensation is given to preach the gospel,” and who act according to it, have no ground of glorying; because “necessity is laid upon them, and woe is to them if they do not:” what will be the case of those, who willingly assume this office, and seek a designation to it; and then bestow no pains to preach the gospel, or to preach at all; but only aim to appropriate to themselves, and to secure to their children, relatives, or dependents, as much as possible of those funds, which were established for the maintenance of such as “labor in the word and doctrine?” Woe! woe! to such “idol-shepherds,” to such hiring priests; yea, to all who encourage and reward their unfaithfulness! (Notes, Is. 56:9—12. Zech. 11:15—17. Mal. 1:9—11.)—But in proportion as we honestly lay ourselves out in this good work, and willingly embrace opportunities of “preaching the gospel without charge,” whenever they offer themselves; and give up our right, lest we “should abuse our power in the gospel;” we may be assured, that we act upon genuine principles, and shall have a gracious reward: for “when the chief Shepherd shall appear, we shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away.” (Note, 1 Pet. 5:1—4. P. O. 1—7.)

V. 19—27.

While we refuse to flatter the person or palliate the vices of any man, or to deviate from truth and duty to gain favor or applause: we should be ready to give up our own interest, humor, credit, or inclinations, and to be “servants to all men,” that “we may gain the more.” (P. O. Rom. 15:1—7.) A mind freed from narrow bigotry, enlarged by comprehensive views of the grand object of the gospel, and taught to keep the great end of doing good continually in view, will know when to wave minute discussions, to connive at less dangerous prejudices; and to venture down towards the ground of other men, in order to argue with them upon their own principles, and to bring them to saving views of the gospel. But while a man postpones, or subordinates, every other thing to this grand object, as far as consists with important truth and duty: while he “becomes all things to all men, that he may gain the more,” to share with him in the great blessings of salvation, and to be useful to persons of different sentiments and descriptions; and while, on the other hand, he will not give place for a moment, where essential truth or the salvation of souls are at stake: he must expect to be deemed a time-server by bigots; inconsistent by the ignorant; a bigot by the unprincipled; and unsound, weak, or unfaithful by the self-conceited. (Note, 2:14—16.) Indeed, we should always watch against extremes. If we have to do with those who are superstitious, or self-righteous; while we insist on the necessity of good works, and connive at their mere external forms; we must be very careful to warn them against relying on their own performances, and decided in leading them to trust in Christ alone. If we have to do with those, who seem to be “without law,” and would endeavor to show them, that true religion requires of us no injurious or useless observances; we must still remember, that we are “not without law to God, but under the law to Christ;” and we must not countenance or connive at their loose principles or practices; and, in condescending to the weak and injudicious, we must not tolerate those errors or faults, which may either injure them, or disgrace the gospel. But a simple heart, a single eye, and an habitual reliance on God for heavenly wisdom, will carry a man through such services and past such dangers, as cannot be directed or guarded against by any rules.—If, however, we would be regarded as men earnestly and zealously seeking the salvation of others, we must not be remiss in securing our own. We must run the race vigorously, if we would have them so to “run that they may obtain.” We must endeavor to practise our own exhortations: in “striving for the mastery, we must be temperate in all things;” and “in fighting the good fight” we must contend, as those who know they are opposed by real and formidable enemies. Thus subduing our sinful passions, habituating every inclination to submit, “keeping our bodies under, and bringing them into subjection,” we shall best enjoy the assurance, that when we have “preached to others we shall not ourselves be cast-aways;” for this, though tremendous in the extreme, it is to be feared, is not at all uncommon. And when we consider what labor, self-denial, self-abasement, and perseverance, men submit to, for the fading honors and distinctions and corruptible interests of this world, of which contested elections in this land give us a striking illustration; it should make us ashamed of shrinking from any hardship, abstinence, self-abasement, or suffering, which may be needful, in securing “the incorruptible crown” and most blessed inheritances for which we are called to contend. Finally, in those ancient contests, and in those of our own days above alluded to, men may without danger or mischief decline the contest: but that “good fight of faith” to which we are called, cannot be declined without incurring the dire penalty of everlasting destruction. We must engage, and we must conquer, or perish among the enemies of God.

CHAP. X.

When Israel came out of Egypt, they all shared in those things, which were sacramental signs of spiritual blessings; yet most of them died in the wilderness, 1—5. Their example is recorded as a warning to professed Christians, not to imitate their crimes, 6—12. God will not suffer his servants to be tempted, so as to have no way of escape, 13. They must flee from idolatry, 14. They cannot have fellowship with Christ and believers, in the Lord's supper; and with idolaters, in those sacrifices which are offered to devils, 15—22. In the use of things lawful, the good of others should be consulted, 23—30; that all may be done to the glory of God, and without giving any occasion of falling to men, 31—33.

that all <sup>b</sup> our fathers <sup>c</sup> were under the cloud, <sup>d</sup> and all passed through the sea,

2 And were all <sup>e</sup> baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea;

3 And <sup>f</sup> did all eat the same spiritual meat;

4 And <sup>g</sup> did all drink the same spiritual drink: for they drank of that spiritual Rock that * followed them: and <sup>h</sup> that Rock was Christ.

5 But <sup>i</sup> with many of them God was not well pleased: for they were overthrowen in the wilderness. [Practical Observations.]

Note.—(Notes, 8: 12:1—3.) In prosecuting his subject, concerning "things offered to idols," the apostle next referred to the case of Israel, and the judgments of God, which came upon them for their lustings, murmurings, and self-indulgence. He would not have the Christians at Corinth ignorant, how that all the fathers of the nation of Israel came out of Egypt under the guidance and protection of "the cloud," which gave them light by night, and was an overshadowing canopy to them by day; being an emblem of the Lord's providential care and gracious guidance of his people: (Marg. Ref. b, c.—Notes, Ex. 13:21,22. 14:19,20,24,25. 40:36—38.) and that the whole company was safely conducted through the Red Sea, in which the Egyptians were drowned. Thus they were initiated, as by baptism, into the true religion, under the instruction of Moses, the type of Christ; by the over-shadowing cloud, and by the waters of the sea: and the whole nation, men, women, and children, were acknowledged as the visible church of God; in a manner which resembled that by which all professed Christians were admitted into the church by baptism. (Marg. Ref. d, e.—Notes, Ex. 14:15. Matt. 28:19,20.) They all, likewise, without exception, were sustained by the manna: and this miraculous provision might be called "spiritual meat;" as it typified Christ, "the Bread of life" to the souls of the true Israel. (Marg. Ref. f.—Notes, Ex. 16:4,5,31—36. Ps. 78:17—31. John 6:30—35,41—58.) And they all drank of those waters, which flowed from the rock, and followed them as a river, through most of their wanderings in the wilderness. This too might be called "spiritual drink;" for it typified the sacred influences of the Holy Spirit, as given to believers through Jesus Christ: and the rock itself might be called "spiritual;" for "that Rock was Christ," a type of him, who was wounded and smitten for our sins, that salvation might be communicated to our perishing souls. (Marg. Ref. g, h.—Notes, Ex. 17:5,6. P. O. 1—7. Num. 20:2—5,10—13. Ps. 78:13—16.)—Nothing can more clearly show the absurdity of forcing figurative language into a literal meaning, and so grounding doctrines upon it, as the Papists have done in the monstrous notion of transubstantiation, than this text does. By such a mode of construction we might prove, that the rock was literally the person of Christ; and that "the rock" followed the Israelites in the wilderness! (Notes, Matt. 26:26—28. Luke 22:19,20.) The Israelites, in respect of these things, seemed all alike the people of God, and dear to him: yet was he "not well pleased with the most of them;" (Note, Num. 16:1—4.) so that they were destroyed in the wilderness in such multitudes, that their dead bodies lay in heaps upon the ground, as after the carnage of some terrible battle. (Marg. Ref. i.)—Our fathers. (1) The ancestors of the Jewish nation.—Baptized. (2) Certainly not by immersion. (Notes, Matt. 20:20—23. Mark 7:3,4. Luke 11:37—40. Acts 2:41. Heb. 9:8—10.)—The same, &c. (4) 'In fact, the sacraments of the ancients were the same as ours, as they had respect to Christ alone.' Beza. Some make their sacraments types of our sacraments, that is, shadows of shadows: but a sacrament is well defined by our church, to be 'an outward and visible sign of an inward aid spiritual grace.'—The apostle evidently intended to warn the Corinthians, not to presume on baptism, or attendance on the Lord's supper, or any external forms, professions, or privileges, as securing to them the favor of God, notwithstanding their sins: and nothing could be better suited to his purpose, than the example of Israel. (Note, Jude 5—8.)

Note.—The apostle, in applying his subject, next observed, that these events were intended to be instructive examples to the Christian church, or figurative representations of God's dealings with his professed worshippers, in all ages: that, by the fatal consequences of Israel's disobedience and rebellion, others might be deterred from allowing an evil concupiscence after sinful or inexpedient indulgences. (Marg. Ref. k, l.—Notes, 9:24—27. Num. 11:4—9,31—34. Ps. 78:17—31. 106:15.) The apostle, therefore, warned the Corinthians to “flee from idolatry,” of which they were in great danger; because they loved the luxurious gratification of their appetites, and the pleasures of a feast, whatever other reasons they assigned for their conduct. (Marg. Ref. m, n.—Notes, Ex. 32:1—6. Ps. 106:19—23.) Some expositors suppose that the word, rendered “to play,” signifies to commit fornication: but the Israelites are not, on that occasion, charged with this crime, or any other of the same nature: and a jovial festive religion, without gross and scandalous immorality, is peculiarly congenial to human nature, as circumstanced in this world. (P. O. Ex. 32:1—14.) For regard to character and worldly interest, and some remaining feeling in the conscience, restrain very large numbers of unconverted persons from direct licentiousness; especially where the word of God is so far known, as to render those crimes shameful, and uneasy to the conscience, which the Gentiles practised without shame or remorse.—In the next verse the apostle directly warns the Corinthians against fornication; to which the inhabitants of Corinth were so addicted, that one Greek word, signifying ‘to commit fornication,’ is taken from the name of that city; (Νομοθετεῖν, to follow the custom of Corinth;) and he adduces the example of Israel, when, by the counsel of Balaam, the daughters of Moab were their tempters, and their fornication was connected with the worship of Baal-peor.—Twenty-three thousand died of the plague, besides one thousand slain by the sword, at the command of Moses. (Marg. Ref. o.—Note, Num. 25:)—He then cautions them against “tempting Christ,” by provoking him to jealousy, wearing out his patience, and putting his love and power to the proof, as the Israelites had done in the wilderness, when he was with them as JEHOVAH of Hosts, their Redeemer. (Marg. (9) This language of the apostle fully confirms the point, that all the appearances recorded in the Old Testament, were made by “the only begotten Son, in the form of God,” and adored as “JEHOVAH, the God of Israel.” (Notes, Gen. 48:15,16. Ex. 3:2,4. 23:20—23. Is. 63:9. Acts 7:37—43. 11 Now all these things happened unto them for *ensamples: <sup>x</sup>and they are written for our admonition, <sup>y</sup>upon whom the ends of the world are come.

12 Wherefore <sup>z</sup>let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall.

Note.—The apostle further observed, that those things, which seemed so severe in respect of Israel, were merciful in the object; being intended as “examples” to others, warning them to restrain their appetites and passions, and to exercise holy caution and humble fear. (Note, 6—10.) Especially they “were written for the admonition” of Christians, “on whom the completion of the ages was come;” who had the substance of the ancient shadows, and the accomplishment of all the prophecies; who enjoyed those advantages, which were the end and perfection of the old dispensation; and who lived under the light of the last and most complete revelation, which was to be vouchsafed to the world. (Marg. Ref. x, y.—Notes, Rom. 10:1—4. 15:4—7. Heb. 11:39,40. 1 John 2:18,19.) For, in proportion to their knowledge, privileges, and encouragements, so ought their holy obedience to be: their guilt would otherwise be more aggravated than under the darker dispensation of the law, and would be punished with more terrible judgments. It therefore was proper, that every man, who supposed himself to stand secure in the favor of God, and strong in the faith of the gospel, without being troubled by weak and superstitious scruples, should “take heed that he did not fall” away from his self-confident profession, and at last lie under the righteous condemnation of God, having only “the form of godliness:” or lest he should, (like Peter, when through self-confidence he neglected to watch and pray,) fall into grievous sin, and thus wound his conscience, expose himself to severe rebukes, disgrace his profession, and injure or ruin the souls of others.

13 There <sup>a</sup> hath no temptation taken you but such as is * common to man; <sup>b</sup> but God is faithful, <sup>c</sup> who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able; but will with the temptation also <sup>d</sup> make a way to escape, that ye may be able to bear it.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The Corinthians would be the more inexcusable, should they, through self-confidence and unwatchfulness, fall into sin: because “no temptation had befallen them,” but such as men in general must meet with, from their own hearts, the suggestions of Satan, and the allurements of the world. (Marg. Ref. a.—Note, Jam. 1:13—15.) For they had not been tempted, by severe persecutions, to deny Christ, or conform to the established idolatry, as many had been and would be. The apostle, however, did not mean to discourage the humble and fearful, by thus mentioning far sharper trials than those which they had met with: for, if indeed they truly believed, the faithfulness of God to his promise and covenant would secure them from being finally overcome by any temptation. (Marg. Ref. b, c.—Notes, 1:4—9. 1 Thes. 5:23—28. 2 Tim. 2:8—13.) He would so direct and over-rule every event, and so restrain the malice of tempters and persecutors, as well as communicate strength proportioned to their trials; that they should never be “tempted above what they were able:” but, in one way or other, he would, in his providence or by his grace, make a way for them to escape, that they should be enabled to bear the trial, and come forth out of it unhurt, however sharp or durable it might be. This cannot mean, that all believers should be rendered victorious over every particular temptation; because in that case they must all be kept from actual sin, which is contrary to fact and scripture: yet it must imply, that no concurrence of circumstances should ever cast them into such temptation, as would render the commission of sin absolutely unavoidable; and that nothing should ever occasion their final apostasy and condemnation. (Notes, John 10:26—31. Rom. 8:32—39.)—The word rendered, “a way to escape,” is suited to lead the reader’s thoughts to the case of a poor shipwrecked mariner, who has indeed escaped to dry land; but the winds roar, the billows rage, the tide flows, the cliffs overhang; and death, inevitable death, seems still to pursue him:—when at length he discovers an opening, or gate, such as are common in some places, where the cliff is high and steep; and thus a most welcome outlet, or “way of escape,” is unexpectedly afforded him. The experience of Christians, who have been peculiarly tried and tempted, till ready to give up hope; and yet have at length been rescued, and filled with admiring gratitude, will show the peculiar propriety of the illustration.

15 I speak <sup>g</sup> as to wise men; judge ye what I say.

16 The <sup>h</sup> cup of blessing which we bless, is it not <sup>i</sup> the communion of the blood of Christ? <sup>k</sup> The bread which we break, is it not the communion of the body of Christ?

17 For <sup>l</sup> we being many are one bread, and one body: for we are all partakers of <sup>m</sup> that one bread.

Note.—The examples and warnings which had been given sufficiently proved, that Christians ought to flee to the greatest distance from all approaches to idolatry, and occasions of it: for if so small a temptation as a feast was more than they could resist; how could they hope to withstand in the evil day of fiery persecution? (Marg. Ref. e, f.—Notes, 8:7—13. Jer. 12:5, 6.) The Christians at Corinth valued themselves on their superior knowledge and wisdom; and the apostle would speak to them “as to wise men,” and call on them, impartially and discreetly, to judge of what he had further to say, against their feasting in the idol-temples. (Marg. Ref. g.—Note, 4:8.) Would they not allow, that the cup of wine, which was used in the Lord’s supper, to represent spiritual blessings, and as an act of praise and thanksgiving to God, after it had been blessed, and set apart by prayer for that purpose, was a token and pledge of their “communion of the blood of Christ,” as the atonement for sin, and of their being made joint partakers of it? And was not the bread which they broke, a token of their participating of his body? Did not a man’s joining in that sacred institution, imply a profession of faith in Christ crucified, and of adoring gratitude to him for this salvation? Certainly every one would put this construction on it: and if a man really intended in his heart, what he thus professed, he would actually be partaker of the Saviour’s blood shed, and body broken, for the sins of the world. (Marg. Ref. h—k.—Notes, 11:23—28. Matt. 26:26—28.) For all Christians, by this sacrament, and the faith sincerely professed in it, and the grace implied, were united, as the grains of wheat in one loaf of bread, or as the members in the human body; seeing they were all one with Christ, and had fellowship with him, and with one another, by partaking of the same bread, as a token of their feeding by faith on the same spiritual nourishment for their souls. (Marg. Ref. l, m.)—In like manner, to join with idolaters, in their feasts at the temples of their idols, must be understood, as a professed act of communion and participation with the idol and its worshippers; and if this were not intended, it was a sort of hypocritical profession.—The apostle calls it, “the cup of blessing,” because when we have it in our hand, we praise and bless, with admiration of his ineffable gift, him who shed his blood for us; and not only shed his blood, but has made us all partakers of it. Ambrose.—“These words, ‘the bread which we break,’ the ‘loaf,’ or bread, is one,” and we all partake of one loaf, and therefore are one body, show how grossly the church of Rome has varied from Christ’s institution, in distributing to the communicants, severally, an unbroken wafer; so that they are neither partakers of one loaf, or bread, or of “bread broken.” Whitby. 20 But I say, that the things which the Gentiles <sup>q</sup> sacrifice they sacrifice to devils, and not to God: and I would not that ye should have fellowship with devils.

22 Do <sup>s</sup> we provoke the Lord to jealousy? <sup>s</sup> are we stronger than he?

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The subject might be illustrated by the case of “Israel after the flesh,” the whole nation, and not merely the company of true believers in Israel. (Note, Gal. 6:15,16.) Those who feasted in the courts of the temple, upon the flesh of the sacrifices and peace-offerings, of which part had been burned upon the altar, were understood to have fellowship with JEHOVAH and his worshippers, and expected to partake of the benefits arising from such sacrifices: and was not the meaning similar, when any one feasted with idolaters in the idol-temples, upon the sacrifices? had not he also communion with the idol and its votaries? (Marg.

Ref. n, o.) Would any persons then suppose the apostle to mean, that an idol was a real being to whom worship was rendered? or that these sacrifices differed materially from other food? (Marg. Ref. p.—Note, 8:4–6.) Thus he knew that some would speculate, to excuse their self-indulgence. But, though the deities, to which they sacrificed, were nonentities, and all the account of their origin and exploits were mere fables, or in a great degree fabulous, being distorted histories of deceased eminent men; yet he must inform them, that their sacrifices were actually presented to devils, fallen angels, malignant demons; and that these ambitious rivals of God were gratified by them, in proportion as God was dishonored and provoked. Perhaps some might suppose, that the name was not essential, and that God was worshipped in these rites, though under another title; (as modern speculators have asserted, that JEHOVAH, or Jupiter, are virtually the same; and that the Supreme Being is worshipped with equal acceptance, ‘in every age and every clime;’) but the apostle assured them, that these sacrifices were not presented to God, but to the determined enemies of God and man; and he would, on no account, have his beloved fellow Christians join themselves with demons and their worshippers. (Marg. Ref. q, r.) Indeed, they could not render the ordinances of Christ consistent with these abominable rites: and if they attempted it, they would provoke the Lord to jealousy, by this familiarity with his detested rivals; as if they were “stronger than he,” and could defend themselves against his judgments: even as a woman, though not guilty of gross adultery, must excite the suspicion and indignation of her husband, if she associated familiarly with the man, of whom he entertained a peculiar jealousy. (Marg. Ref. s, t.—Note, Ex. 20:5.)—The apostle joined himself in these inquiries, to show how greatly he abhorred such a conduct, and how he should dread the consequences of being seduced into it. ‘Dare you then, being espoused to Christ, provoke the Lord to jealousy by idolatry, which is spiritual whoredom? “Are you stronger than he,” and able to resist him, when he shall let loose his fury against you?’ Locke.—Devils. (20,21.) Notes, Lev. 17:1–7, v. 7. Deut. 32:17. 1 Tim. 4:1–5.—Some writers contend, that this simply means intermediate beings, superior to man, but inferior to God. But are holy angels here included? Certainly not. Then fallen angels, or wicked spirits, must exclusively be intended: and the worship of the idolaters, though not rendered to “the devil,” in the exact scriptural meaning of the word, which distinguishes between “the devil, and his angels,” (Matt. 25:41.) was rendered to evil spirits, not perhaps by express intention, (though the character and conduct ascribed to the objects of the pagan worship, renders even this doubtful,) yet eventually: evil spirits were substituted in the place of God, and received the glory due to him.—The scripture knows nothing of demons, in a good sense; whatever heathen writers did, or learn-

28 But if any man say unto you, This is offered in sacrifice unto idols, <sup>f</sup> eat not for his sake that showed it, and for conscience' sake; <sup>g</sup> for the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof:

Note.—(Notes, 6:12—17. 8:7—13.) Feasting in the idol-temples having been proved to be direct idolatry; the apostle next proceeded to show, that some limitations must be assigned to their liberty, and expediency and mutual edification consulted, in the use even of lawful things. He exhorted his brethren at Corinth therefore not to seek their own indulgence or satisfaction, exclusively or principally; but to study the spiritual welfare and advantage of their brethren and neighbors, whom they ought "to love as themselves;" and for whose greater good they ought to give up every inferior interest or gratification. (Marg. Ref. x, y.) They might, however, be allowed to eat without scruple what they bought in the public market; without asking any questions, whether it had been offered to an idol or not: lest they should receive an answer, which might perplex or wound the consciences of their brethren, if their own were out of danger: for, as "the earth and its fulness" belonged to the Lord, they might partake of his bounty without hesitation, provided they knew no reason to the contrary. (Marg. Ref. z—b. g.—Note, Ps. 24:1,2.) In like manner, if an unbelieving friend or relation invited any of them to his house, and they were disposed to go; (which in many cases would be "lawful," and in some even "expedient;") let them eat of the provisions set before them without asking any questions. But if one informed them, that this or the other dish was part of an idol-sacrifice, let them refrain from eating of it: because it would be proper thus to protest against idolatry, and to show their judgment of it, for the benefit especially of him who told them, whether he were a Christian or an unbeliever; and that they might not wound the conscience of any man. And, as "the earth and its fulness were the Lord's;" they could not need such defiled food, but might be supplied with other meat, though they abstained from this. (Marg. Ref. c—f.)

—Some versions and manuscripts omit the concluding clause: but there appears to me a peculiar beauty in the repetition, and it is entirely in the apostle's manner.—All things are lawful, &c. (23) 'Tertullian, speaking of women's apparel, says, 'How much more easily will she 'fear things unlawful, who is cautious and 'scrupulous in things lawful?' Thus Clement 'also, 'They who do whatever is lawful, will 'soon glide into that which is unlawful.' Beza.—Bid you, &c. (27) The words "to a feast," are here needlessly and improperly added. The invitation of a relation or friend, who had not embraced the gospel, does not imply the idea of "a feast," but merely a social meeting and meal.—The earth, &c. (26,28.) Note.—The apostle observed, perhaps with reference to the self-confidence of some at Corinth, that he did not so much mean that they ought to abstain for the sake of their own consciences, for he supposed them able to discard all scruples of this kind; but for the sake of other men's consciences, especially those of their weaker brethren. (Note, 8:7—13.) Yet they would inquire, why their liberty was to be thus judged and restrained, out of regard to other men's consciences; or why they were to be blamed and slandered, in eating those things, for which they gave thanks, and which they received in a thankful and believing frame of mind. (Marg. Ref. h—k.—Notes, Rom. 14:2—6. 1 Tim. 4:1—5.) Thus we may explain the passage, as the objection of the Corinthians to the apostle's directions: but it may be understood as his inquiry: Why should they so incautiously use their liberty, as to give cause for its being condemned, in the consciences of other men? Or why should they so use those good gifts of God, which they received with thanksgiving, as to give cause for slander or offence? (Note, Rom. 14:13—18.) He therefore concluded this subject, by admonishing them, "whether they ate or drank," in any place or company, or "whatever they did," to do it all with an habitual aim at the glory of God; by considering his precepts, and the propriety, expediency, appearance, and tendency, of their actions, and the construction which others would put upon them; and by acting with prudence, temperance, thankfulness, consistency, and charity in every thing. (Marg. Ref. l.—Notes, Luke 11:41. Col. 3:16, 17, 22—25.) Thus the whole tenor of their conduct would show the excellency of the gospel, and conduce to win over others to it; by which the name and perfections of God would be the more extensively known, adored, and glorified. This great end they ought habitually to have in view; whatever interfered with it ought to be avoided; and every interest, pursuit, and indulgence should be rendered subordinate, or even, if possible, subservient to it. They would then be careful not to give needless offence to any man; to throw no stumbling-block in the way, either of Jews or Gentiles; and not to give occasion of sin to the church, or any believer; but to imitate the apostle as he imitated Christ, (Note, 11:1.) and according to what he had shown them of his principles and conduct. (Note, 9:9—27.) For he had endeavored to please men of all descriptions, and in all things, as far as consisted with faithfulness; in nothing consulting his own emolument or satisfaction, but "the good of many, in order to their salvation." (Marg. and Marg. Ref. m—o.—Note, Rom. 15:1—3.)—Neither to the Jews. (32) "The Jew will be apt hence to conclude, that Christianity renders you enemies to the law and the prophets; the Gentiles, that your professed abhorrence of idols is not real, and that the practice in which you comply with them is not sinful: and the weak Christian will be tempted by your example, to eat these things "with conscience of the idol," (8:7.) or to fly off from the Christian faith." Whitby.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5.

The mistakes and sins of professed Christians, commonly originate from ignorance of the scriptures, or from a partial attention to them. If this ignorance, either total or partial, were not common, men could not suppose, that forms, ordinances, or assent to doctrines, would procure them a licence to indulge evil passions, or impunity in the allowed practice of sin.—Men may seem to be converted; they may give a specious account of convictions, terrors, and comforts in regular succession, and make a credible profession of faith; they may be admitted members of the visible church, where the strictest discipline is exercised, and stately hear the most faithful instruction; they may be greatly distinguished by external privileges and gifts; they may be baptized in any form, and receive the "spiritual meat" and "drink" of the Lord's supper, in the purest societies: and yet, not 'feeding on Christ himself' in their hearts 'by faith, with thanksgiving,' God will not be well pleased with them, but they will die short of Canaan, and perish with the multitude of the ungodly. (Notes, Heb. 3:14—19. 4:1,2.)—So vain are all, even the most scriptural outward signs, or sacramental pledges of salvation, without that "inward and spiritual grace," which is signified by them!

V. 6—13.

The examples, recorded in the word of God "for our admonition," who in these latter ages of the world enjoy the full benefit of all preceding revelations, should warn us to repress every evil lust; to avoid a festive, sensual religion, which gratifies the eye, the ear, the taste; and which connects with "sitting down to eat and drink, and rising up to play;" to keep at a distance from every forbidden indulgence: not to "tempt Christ," by running ourselves into those dangers in which many have perished; and to avoid all "murmurings and disputings," by which the enemy of souls has made immense havoc in the church. Above all, we should beware of "a haughty spirit, which goes before a fall;" and "while we think we stand," we should trust in God to preserve us from deceiving ourselves, and from falling by temptation; using every means of security against evils so fatal and lamentable. In these quiet times, we have "no temptation" to resist, "but such as is common to man;" and if we cannot now stand our ground against the world, the flesh, and the devil, what should we do in the fiery trial of persecution? If not prepared to give up a trifling interest, or worthless indulgence, for Christ's sake; how should we yield our bodies to the flames in his cause?—Whether the world smiles or frowns, it is a dangerous enemy: but if we are believers, we shall be enabled to overcome it, with all its terrors and fascinations. (Notes, John 16:31—33. 1 John 2:15—17. 5:4,5.) nor will our faithful God, who "keepeth his covenant and mercy to them that fear him, suffer us to be tempted above what we are able." We may often be alarmed, harassed, baffled, and even cast down; but we shall rise again superior to our foes: for "with every temptation he will make a way for us to escape, that we may be able to bear it." Yet "his fear put into our hearts" will be one great means of our safety; and the greater our humble jealousy is concerning ourselves, the more we shall escape such falls, as, when not fatal, are productive of most painful and mischievous consequences to ourselves and others.

V. 14—22.

In all cases, we should "flee from temptation," and every occasion of sin; and not foolishly or ostentatiously parley with it.—If we would be deemed wise and prudent, let us show our wisdom by a circumspect conduct, and not by curious speculations.—Our union and communion with Christ and his people, by partaking of his ordinances, should engage us to avoid all "fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness;" and all conformity to the vanities of the world. When we receive the outward signs of the body and blood of Christ; we should seriously inquire into the sincerity of this profession of faith in him and his atonement; and of our desire to live devoted to his service, and united to his people, as "one bread, and one body," with him and them. For "the world lieth in the wicked one;" ungodly men are the servants of the devil, and false religion is his worship, however ingeniously numbers may varnish over or deny this awful truth: we cannot unite the service of God with that of devils; or have "fellowship with Christ," and with those enemies, whose "works he was manifested to destroy;" (Notes, 2 Cor. 6:14—18. 1 John 3:7—10, v. 8.) and they, who aim at such a coalition, are commonly hypocrites in their religion, and only sincere in their idolatrous worship of mammon. If Christians will venture into those places, and join in those sacrifices, to "the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life;" (Note, 1 John 2:15—17.) which are of no ill repute even in this favored land, they will certainly "provoke the Lord to jealousy;" and, seeing they cannot endure his omnipotent indignation, why should they foolishly act as if they were "stronger than he?" and what must eventually be the consequence? (Note, Job 40:9—14.)

V. 23—33.

Let us not be amused and imposed on with "vain words," about the innocence of this or the other worldly pleasure: these apologies are seldom grounded in truth: but if they were, Are such indulgences "expedient?" Do they tend to edification? Do they consist with charity? Might not the time and money be better employed? Does not the example grieve or mislead others? Let us not then be so selfish, as to seek our own needless indulgence, in preference to the important good of our neighbors. —While we trust in the Lord for our temporal provision, and thankfully receive it as his gift; let us be careful to use our liberty, or plenty, in such a manner, that we may "avoid the appearance of evil," of excess or selfishness, and of whatever may occasion censure or suspicion; and, that piety, charity, temperance, and prudence, may so regulate even our feasts and meals, and every part of our conduct, that "whether we eat or drink, or whatever we do, we may do all to the glory of God." Connected with this great end, we should be careful to give no needless "offence," or occasion any prejudice, in the minds of unbelievers of any description; and not to cause any discord in the church, or disquietude to the consciences even of weak believers: but we should endeavor in all things "to please others" rather than ourselves, as far as it consists with our duty, or can conduce to their profit and salvation; (Note, 2 Cor. 6:3—10. P. O. 1—10.) and yet to displease any man, or body of men, when the will and glory of God are evidently concerned. And let us remember, that he, who gives us these admonitions, and calls us to follow him as he followed Christ, was the writer of those scriptures, which most fully declare the doctrines of free grace, and of God's eternal purposes of special love to his chosen people; which therefore must consist with these practical instructions, though many are unable to perceive that consistency.

CHAP. XI.

The apostle exhorts the Corinthians to imitate him, as he imitated Christ, 1. He praises them for observing his injunctions, 2. He gives directions concerning men and women prophesying, 3—16. He blames them for abuses in their religious assemblies, especially for their divisions, 17—19; and their profanation of the Lord's supper, 20—22; reminding them of the first institution of it; and showing the danger, and the painful effects, arising from the partaking of it unworthily, 23—34.

BE<sup>a</sup> ye followers of me, <sup>b</sup> even as I also am of Christ.

Note.—This verse is most evidently connected with the conclusion of the preceding chapter: it referred to what the apostle had written concerning his own conduct, in the ninth chapter, and it concludes the subject which began in the eighth. (Notes, 8:7—13. 9:13—27. 10:29—33.)—He called on the Corinthians to become "imitators of him, even as he imitated Christ," especially in the charitable and cautious use of their Christian liberty: (Note, Rom. 15:1—3.) and he thus hinted, that they had in this respect followed others, who had acted contrary to the will and the example of Christ. woman; but the woman for the man.

10 For this cause ought the woman to have * power on her head, * because of the angels.

16 But if any man † seem to be contentious, we have no † such custom, neither † the churches of God.

Note.—The apostle here entered on another subject; and began to discuss several particulars respecting the public assemblies of the Christians at Corinth; which, with some digressions, he continued to the end of the fourteenth chapter. As he was about to reprove various instances, in which they had been greatly reprehensible; he thought it advisable to begin by a general commendation of their conduct, in remembering him and observing his injunctions; though this admitted of some exceptions, or some misconstructions had taken place. (Marg. Ref. c—e.) In the abundance of spiritual gifts bestowed on them, several women had been endued with the Spirit of prophecy, which enabled them, by immediate inspiration, to offer prayers for the congregation, or to give instructions, or even to predict future events: for it is not at all reasonable to suppose, that a woman could be said to “prophecy,” merely by being present when another prophesied. (Notes, Ex. 15:20, 21. Judg. 4:4. 5:1. 1 Sam. 2:1—10. 2 Kings 22:14. Luke 2:36—38. Acts 2:14—21. 21:7—14, vv. 8, 9.) This seems to have been the only case, in which women were allowed to speak in public, and in this respect some abuses had crept in. (Notes, 14:34, 35. 1 Tim. 2:11—14.)—In order to understand what was becoming, in this exempt case; the apostle would have them to understand, that Christ was the immediate “Head,” or Ruler of every man, whose honor was concerned in his conduct: and that the man was the immediate “head” and ruler of the woman, to whose authority God had subjected her, and who would therefore be disgraced by any impropriety in her behavior; and that Christ, as Mediator, was subject to God, as his Head and Principal; to whose glory the whole of his administration, in his mediatorial government, was referred. (Marg. Ref. f—h.—Note, Phil. 2:9—11.) As therefore Christ did the will and sought the honor of God; so the Christian should avow his subjection to Christ, doing his will and seeking his glory; and the woman should acknowledge her subjection to the man, and, in all things lawful, do what was pleasing and honorable to him. According to the custom of those days, “a veil” on the head was the token of subjection, and respect to superiors: if a man therefore should pray or prophesy with such a covering, he would dishonor “Christ his Head,” by acting out of character, and appearing as if he was placed in subjection to the woman, instead of in authority over her. On the other hand, it would be inconsistent with modesty, and her state of subjection, for a woman to lay aside her veil on such occasions: for thus she would seem to forget her place, and to affect authority; which would dishonor the man, whom God had appointed to be as “a head” over her. Nay, this would be so great an impropriety, that it would be of a similar meaning with the “shaving” of her head; which was a disgraceful punishment, that was sometimes inflicted on women of bad character.—If then the women persisted in exercising their gifts “uncovered, let them be shorn or shaven:” but if they counted this shameful, let them wear their veils.—Some think that these prophetesses had their hair dishevelled, after the manner of the Pythian priestesses of Apollo; and if this was so, it would be an additional reason for the apostle thus strenuously to oppose them.—The man indeed, being “the image and glory of God,” and appointed as his representative in ruling over this lower world, ought not to be veiled on these occasions. (Marg. Ref. o.—Note, Gen. 1:26, 27.) But the woman reflecting, as it were, the glory of the man, being formed his counterpart, and the most honorable subject of his delegated authority, ought to avow her willing subjection by wearing the veil. For the woman was not originally created separately, but taken out of the man; as a part of him, yet inferior to him: neither was the man created for the woman’s advantage, but the woman for that of the man. (Note, Gen. 2:18—25.) On this account therefore, the woman ought to be covered with her veil, even when praying or prophesying, as an emblem of her being under the authority of the man.—Many conjectures have been formed concerning the meaning of the following expression, “because of the angels:” but, probably, the apostle referred to the presence of holy angels, who had witnessed the creation of man as spectators, or were even in some respects joint worshippers with believers, in their public assemblies; which therefore ought to be regulated with the most exact propriety, that these heavenly worshippers might not witness any thing unbecoming so holy an occasion. (Marg. Ref. s.—Note, Job 38:4—7.)—But, though the woman had been created for the man, and subjected to him; yet no difference was made between them in respect of acceptance in Christ, as they were called together to have fellowship with him. Nor ought the authority of the man to be exercised harshly, but in tenderness and love; seeing that, as the woman was originally “from the man,” so the man hath ever since been “by the woman;" born of her, and tended on in infancy by her tender care: that, as both were reciprocally means of comfort and benefit to each other, so, they should live together, in harmony and affection. But all things were to be considered, as derived from God; and regulated by him, whose wise appointments ought to be submitted to. (Marg. Ref. 1.) The Corinthians therefore might "judge for themselves," whether according to the constitution of the Creator, it would be comely for a woman, to appear uncovered in the act of worshipping him. Even "nature would teach them," that if a man wore his hair long, and tired in the manner which custom had appropriated to women; it would be a disgrace to him, and be considered as a proof of effeminacy and folly. (Note, 2 Sam. 14:25-27.) On the other hand, long hair, when decently tired according to the custom of the times, would be an honor to a woman, being given to her as a natural veil; and to wear her hair short, as men used to do, would appear masculine and disgraceful: and, for the same reason, she ought to wear her veil on her head when praying, that she might keep her proper place and appear in character. These things the apostle stated as decent and proper: but if any of the Corinthian teachers appeared inclinable to excite a contention about them; he would only add, that he and his brethren knew of no such custom as prevailed among them: nor was there any such in the churches of God, which had been planted by the other apostles. 17 ¶ Now in this that I declare unto you, <sup>d</sup> I praise you not, <sup>e</sup> that ye come together, not for the better, but for the worse.

18 For first of all, when ye come together in the church, <sup>f</sup> I hear that there be * divisions among you; and I partly believe it.

19 For <sup>g</sup> there must be also † heresies among you, that they <sup>h</sup> which are approved may be made manifest among you.

21 For <sup>i</sup> in eating, every one taketh before other his own supper; <sup>k</sup> and one is hungry, and another is drunken.

22 What! <sup>l</sup> have ye not houses to eat and to drink in? <sup>m</sup> or despise ye the church of God, and shame them § that have not? What shall I say to you? shall I praise you in this? I praise you not.

Note.—Another exception the apostle must adduce, to the general commendation, which he had bestowed upon the Corinthians, (2) for when they came together, they behaved so disorderly, that it conduced to their detriment, rather than to their edification; and thus they lost more in one way, than they gained in others, in respect of religious improvement. For, in the first place, when they assembled, as a society met together for the worship of God, in which they ought to have been of one heart and mind; there were divisions, or schisms, among them. Though they met in one place, as one congregation; yet they were divided into parties, and were actuated by carnal competition and mutual animosity. This disgraceful report he had heard; and he believed it in part, or concerning a part of them: for he was so acquainted with human nature, and with the temper of the Corinthians, that he was aware these schisms would be followed by heresies also; or by a more entire separation of some of them from the rest, out of zeal for the pernicious doctrines which they had espoused. (Marg. Ref. d—g.—Notes, 1:10-16. Rom. 11:25-32. 2 Pet. 2:1-3.)—"It seems evident from hence, that heresy is something 'worse than the schism above-mentioned.' Doddridge.—This, Satan was attempting; and God would permit it to take place, in order to distinguish his "approved" servants, by their steadfast adherence to the truth, from the unsound characters who had crept in among them. (Note, 1 John 2:18,19.)—Their assembling together in one place, with divided hearts, was very evil; and their subsequent conduct was so selfish and sensual, that though they professed to celebrate the Lord's supper, they could not be said to do this, but rather to substitute a carnal feast in the stead of it. For they brought their own provisions with them, and ate separately; not waiting for each other, or communicating with each other! So that a self-indulgent or intemperate meal had succeeded to that holy feast of faith and love: and, while the poor went away hungry, for want of proper provision, the rich ate and drank plentifully, if not to excess! (Notes, Gen. 43:34, John 2:6-11.) What could be said to such a scandalous profanation? "Had they not houses?" to feast in on their abundance, and to which they might invite their friends? Did they despise the assembled church of God, as if it had been a company of intemperate revellers? Or did the rich purpose to shame their poor brethren, because they had not suitable provisions? Would they have the apostle of Christ applaud such profane, uncharitable, and sensual practices? This he would not do, though glad to praise them when he could. Such a refusal of commendation, as this was, implied the severest rebuke. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 2 Pet. 2:12—14. Jude 11—13.)—It is almost unaccountable that a Christian church, in a short time after this eminent apostle had left them, should run into so abominable a profanation of this sacred institution. But the public feasts of the Greeks were frequently conducted in this manner, which appears to us as inconsistent with civility as with piety. The self-conceited Corinthian teachers carried their notions, of Christian liberty, to an excess almost inconceivable at present: they not only joined in the idolatrous feasts of their neighbors, but they introduced the customs of them into the church, and so perverted this sacred feast: and, to show the folly of man's wisdom, they were left thus to disgrace themselves more than any other church, because they thought themselves wiser than others. (Note, 4:9—13.)—It is also wonderful that the apostle should express so favorable an opinion of the professed Christians at Corinth in general, notwithstanding these gross abuses: and we should thence learn caution in condemning whole religious societies, because of those evils, which perhaps but few fully approve, though numbers are seduced to connive at them.—‘The Judaizing converts thought themselves obliged to drink plentifully at their festivals; four large cups of wine, saith Dr. Lightfoot, at the paschal supper; and to be quite drunk, saith Buxtorf, at the feast of ‘Purim.’ Whitby. (Note, Esth. 9:21—32. P. O. 17—32.) If such sentiments were publicly avowed, at the time when the apostle wrote, our astonishment at the facts advanced may be abated; but our abhorrence should be proportionably increased.—‘Though the Corinthians had written to St. Paul, requesting his ... directions in several points; ... yet they had not said one syllable about the enormities which had crept in amongst them, and in the ‘blame of which they all shared: ... his information, concerning these irregularities, had come to him from other quarters. Note.—To remedy the disorders, which prevailed in the Corinthian church, the apostle referred them to the original appointment of the Lord’s supper; with which he had been made acquainted by immediate revelation from Christ, and which he had faithfully delivered to them when he was at Corinth. This account of the institution of the Lord’s supper entirely coincides with that which has been considered, and fully confirms the interpretation given of it. It was of great importance, that it should be here repeated and enforced, that the obligation of the institution, to the end of the world, might be fully ascertained. The words “which is broken for you,” are here added, to those recorded by Matthew and Mark; and substituted for “which is given for you,” in Luke’s gospel. (Marg. Ref. n—t.—Mark 14:22—25. Luke 22:19,20. Notes, Matt. 26:26—29.) The body of Christ, as “broken,” in his sufferings and death, is represented by the bread broken: but an unbroken wafer does not represent this most material circumstance.—It is also here added, that as “oft as they drank of the cup,” they ought to do it “in remembrance of” Christ; in order that the frequent recollection of his love, his sufferings, and their obligations to him, might have a proper effect upon their hearts and lives.

Whenever they attended on this sacred service, they would "show the Lord's death;" that is, profess their faith in it, and declare the end and efficacy of it, till he should come to judgment. (Marg. Ref. u.) The manner in which the quakers evade this decisive declaration, by saying, till the time when Christ should come, by his spiritual illumination on their minds, to take them off from carnal ordinances, is a striking instance of perverse ingenuity, used in defence of rooted prejudices.—The apostle here repeatedly speaks of "the bread," after its consecration, or appropriation to that particular use; which is decisive against those absurd and monstrous interpretations, which have been put upon our Lord's words.—He further declared, that whosoever should partake of this ordinance "unworthily;" that is, in a profane, carnal, or irreverent manner, as an ordinary meal, or a sensual feast, or for secular purposes, would "be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord;" would be chargeable with treating them contemptuously; and, in a measure, with a share of the guilt contracted by those, who wounded his sacred body, and shed his precious blood, upon the cross. (Marg. Ref. x.) It was therefore proper for every man, however approved by his pastors and brethren, "to examine himself;" concerning the reality of his faith and repentance, the sincerity of his profession, his intentions in communicating, the state of his heart, and the tenor of his conduct: not in order to find some reason for absenting himself; but that, after such self-examination and serious preparation of heart, he might commemorate the Lord's death in a proper manner, and according to his appointment. (Marg. Ref. z, a.—Note, Matt. 5:23,24.) This expressly shows it to be every Christian's duty, to attend on this sacrament; and that both the bread and the wine should be administered to all without exception. Indeed, in one place, it is in the original, "shall eat this bread, or drink this cup, &c." (27); and the needless variation in our version has caused some cavils of the papists: yet the verse would as readily prove, that the wine alone, as that the bread alone, should be received: but, in fact, it only shows that both bread and wine should be received, in a serious, believing, and reverential manner.—The 'true form of celebrating the Lord's supper must be sought from its first institution, of which these were the parts. The pastors must declare the death of the Lord by preaching his word; bless the bread and wine, having called on the name of God, and explained 'the institution along with their prayers; and 'finally, deliver the broken bread to be eaten, 'and the cup to be taken and drunk, with 'thanksgivings. The flock must prove themselves, that is, carefully examine their knowledge, faith, and repentance; they must "show forth the death of Christ," that is, by true 'faith consent to his word and appointment; 'and finally, receive the bread from the hand 'of the minister, and eat it, and drink the wine, 'and give thanks to the Lord. This was the 'liturgy of Paul and the apostles. ... Show (26) 'That is, publicly profess that you believe, and 'embrace it with thanksgiving.' Beza.—From one loaf, our Lord, having broken, gave a portion to each person present, and they all drank from the same cup, as a token that all believers alike partake of the blessings signified in that sacred ordinance, and have communion with one another, as one in Christ. (Note, 10:14—17.) How different this, from a number of people meeting together, to make a meal each separately from the provisions, which they had brought with them!—Much has been written, by some expositors, concerning the love-feasts, which are supposed to have accompanied the administration of the Lord's supper in the primitive times, as having given occasion to the disorders, which the apostle here re-proves: but it is not certain, that he at all refers to them; and indeed it is not certain, or very probable that they were at this time in use. Note.—To show still further the necessity of self-examination, the apostle declared that every one, who unworthily partook of this sacred feast, would "eat and drink judgment to himself." (Marg.) His very attendance on this religious service would offend God, and expose him to his righteous judgment; because he made no proper discrimination between the bread and wine, which represented the Lord's body as offered on the cross a sacrifice for our sins, to be received by faith, and an ordinary meal. This irreverence, being a heinous crime, would doubtless subject a man to final condemnation, if he did not repent: but certainly the apostle did not mean, that it was in its own nature unpardonable; or that it sealed a man's damnation, as very many have supposed: for he was addressing Christians, and warning them to beware of incurring those temporal judgments with which God chastised his offending servants.—The scruples and consequent neglect of numbers, who seem in other things to obey Christ, have no ground in this passage, except in the apparent harshness of our translation, in which the word, that signifies "judgment," is rendered damnation; and this commonly means eternal punishment. Indeed, the conscious unworthiness, and lamented infirmities of those, who desire to express their gratitude for redeeming love, are widely different from the profanations of these Corinthians, who yet were not at all supposed to have sinned beyond the hope of pardon: and generally they, who deem themselves most unworthy, are least likely to receive "unworthily;" which is commonly the sin of the careless, or proud, and self-sufficient.—But the apostle more fully explained his meaning in what follows: for he observed, that, on account of these profanations, many of them were visited with enfeebling and wasting sickness; and several had even been cut off by death: which, being called "sleep," was charitably supposed to be that of believers. (Marg. Ref. c, d.—Note, 5:1—5. 1 Kings 13: 20—32. P. O. 20—34. Notes, 2 Kings 22:15—20. 2 Chr. 35:20—24.) For, if men would call themselves to an account for their conduct, and humble themselves before God in deep repentance; they would escape many temporal calamities, as well as final condemnation: but when Christians were thus judged, and visited 'with divers diseases and sundry kinds of death,' "they were chastened of the Lord, that," being led to repentance, "they might not be condemned with the world." (Marg. Ref. e—g.)—As this was the case, the apostle exhorted them to "tarry" for each other, and to commemorate the death of their most gracious Lord, in charity and peace, as well as in faith and piety: and let them satisfy their hunger at home, and not think of making a full meal, or a sensual feast, of the Lord's supper; by which they exposed themselves to condemnation and very painful visitations, even when meeting together in the Saviour's name. As to the rest, he purposed to come shortly, and then he would regulate matters by his apostolical authority.—It is manifest, that the custom, which some scrupulously adhere to, as a matter of conscience, often to the injury of their health, of receiving the Lord's supper fasting, has not the smallest ground in scripture, and is in fact a mere superstition: as is the still much more common notion, that irreverence, or even involuntary defects and mistakes, in this sacrament, are far more heinous and perilous, than in other acts of worship; or even in administering or receiving baptism.—It should also be observed, that the apostle does not speak of worthy or unworthy participants; but of eating and drinking unworthily. Not the character of the person, but the manner of receiving the Lord's supper, forms his direct subject.—We do not presume

'righteousness; but in thy manifold and great mercies. We are not worthy so much as to 'gather up the crumbs under thy table.' Communion Service. The self-righteous must then receive most unworthily, because he proudly thinks himself worthy: and that man comes in the most worthy manner, who approaches in deep humility, profound reverence, simple dependence on the mercy of God, through the atoning blood of Christ, and lively gratitude for favors so entirely undeserved. "So is the danger great, if we receive the same unworthily: 'for then we are guilty of the body and blood 'of Christ our Saviour: we eat and drink our 'own damnation, not considering the Lord's 'body: we kindle God's wrath against us: we 'provoke him to plague us with divers diseases, 'and sundry kinds of death.' Exhortation. Communion Service. The concluding words explain what precedes, but by no means so clearly, as the apostle explains what he intended by "eating and drinking judgment to himself," and the former part is often misunderstood, and excites many needless fears and scruples, in the minds of humble and conscientious believers.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16.

We ought to imitate no man, any further than he imitates Christ, whose example alone is absolutely perfect: nor should we desire, that others should follow us, except as we are enabled to follow our Lord and Master.—When we must blame in some things; we should show a disposition to be pleased, by commending and excusing whatever will admit of it.—In order to know our duty in various particulars, we should accurately study our relations to God, and to each other in society and in the church. His plan of government includes a regular subordination. The immediate government of mankind, especially of Christians, is vested in One who bears our nature, and who, as Mediator, acknowledges "the Father as his Head:" under this mediatorial authority, he has appointed man to be the head of the woman, who immediately rules over her; that, "as the image and glory of God," he may in this, and other instances of relative authority, shadow forth the glory and obligations of the divine government. But the Lord has so arranged matters, both in the kingdom of providence, and in that of grace; that the authority of the superior, and the subjection of the inferior, relations, should conduce to the mutual help and benefit of all concerned. (Notes, Eph. 5:22—33. 1 Pet. 3:1—7.)—Even nature and the common sense of mankind, require that men and women should preserve a due distinction in their apparel, behavior, and appearance; and the contrary to this is contemptible and odious. The particulars, by which this distinction shall be expressed, are generally determined by custom; but, however fashions may vary, an effeminate man, and a masculine woman, will always be disgusting and disgraceful.—The believer's conduct should be so regulated, that it may "honor Christ his Head;" for even his indiscretions, and improprieties, will in a measure dishonor his profession: in like manner, the conduct of women will either do credit to their husbands, and those who stand nearly related to them, or it will disgrace them. (Note, 1 Tim. 3:4,5. P. O. 8—16.) Much attention therefore to decorum is necessary: but especially, in every thing relating to the worship of God, where nothing unseemly, or improper for any one's state, rank, or character, ought to be tolerated. And not only should our sense of the Lord's special presence influence our conduct in this manner; but even that of the holy angels, who, in our assemblies, must witness many things unworthy of the sacred service, and which ought carefully to be avoided.

V. 17—22.

Alas! how often do even the professors of the gospel "meet together for the worse instead of the better!" Especially, how frequently do animosities and personal or party-contentions divide religious societies, and corrupt the apparently united worship! Indeed, in the present state of human nature, such "schisms" and "heresies" cannot altogether be avoided: but, while we adore the wisdom of God, in overruling these evils for the manifestation of those who are approved by him; we must by no means palliate the guilt of such persons, who thus divide and distract the church. The Lord, indeed, can take occasion from the most aggravated profanations, to establish the most beneficial regulations, of which this chapter gives us a striking specimen; but that display of his wisdom and goodness is far from excusing the criminals, or exempting them from punishment. (Note, Rom. 3:5—8.)—We should rejoice, that we are under no temptation to pervert the Lord's supper to an imtemperate revel; but we may seriously inquire, whether profanations, equally flagrant and expressive of contempt, are not common among us. How often do avarice, ambition, and extravagance send their infidel, impious, or profligate votaries, to qualify for preferment by this sacred institution! How often do custom and ostentation lead sinners of superior rank to exhibit their petty distinctions, even in attending on this sacrament, which especially requires our most humble gratitude! How often is it made the support of Pharisaical pride, or the cloak with which hypocrites cover dishonesty, or secret licentiousness! Shall we praise men for such things? Surely not! nay, we must most strenuously and decidedly protest against them: and pray earnestly and constantly to God, to incline the hearts of those who have authority in the church, to use proper and effectual methods, with impartial decision, of terminating such scandalous practices; doing all we can in the mean time, in our several places, to counteract and prevent them; without fearing reproach or persecution, in whatever form it may come upon us.

V. 23—34.

Those who understand what the apostles "received" from Christ, and "delivered to" the church, respecting the interesting season when the Lord's supper was appointed, even that very night, in which the Saviour was betrayed; and concerning the meaning, use, and benefit of it, will be fully convinced, that a penitent heart, a simple reliance on God's free mercy by faith in Christ, according to "the new covenant in his blood;" a thankful recollection of his sufferings and of his love; a desire "to show his death," to profess our obligations to him, and to give up ourselves to his service, in doing good to his people, and to all men for his sake, constitute the proper preparation for acceptably communicating. All, who aim, and pray to be enabled to come in this frame of heart and mind, are bound in gratitude, and by their professed subjection to Christ, to "show the Lord's death till he come." Such persons are not likely "to eat and drink unworthily," or to be "guilty of the body and blood of Christ;" and their fears and scruples are in general the effect of mistake: for every one is fit to come to this sacred service, who can pray for spiritual blessings in the name of Christ, without hypocrisy, and in an acceptable manner. There should, however, be an habitual self-examination; and a more particular one, at those times, when we have opportunity: this will more and more convince the humble believer of the difference between his case, and that of profane, proud, and carnal communicants. The same method will prevent other evils and mistakes, which might bring chastisements upon us. But the end of self-examination should be renewed repentance, acceptance of Christ, and prayer for grace to enable us to "discern the Lord's body," and to attend on this sacred feast in a humble, spiritual, and grateful manner; and not to find excuses for neglecting "this our bounden duty and service."—In every respect we act most wisely for our present comfort, as well as for our future good, when we "judge ourselves, that we may not be judged of the Lord." Our personal and family-trials should remind us, that he has a controversy with us: but, as we are apt to be partial, or dilatory, in "judging ourselves," we should count it a mercy to be "chastened of the Lord, that we may not be condemned with the world;" and to suffer any thing, even unto death, by which we may escape the eternal damnation of the wicked. (Note, 5:1—5.) Yet it is prudent for us to act with such caution, piety, charity, seriousness, and temperance; that we may, as much as we can, avoid chastenings, which "for the present seem not joyous, but grievous," though they afterwards "bring forth the peaceable fruits of righteousness to them who are exercised thereby."

CHAP. XII.

The apostle instructs the Corinthians in the origin, nature, variety, and use, of "spiritual gifts," 1—11. He illustrates the subject, by showing how the members in the human body perform their several functions, for the benefit of the whole, 12—26; and applies this to the church, and its different orders of ministers, and members, 27—30. He concludes with exhortation, 31.

3 Wherefore I give you to understand, that <sup>f</sup> no man speaking by the Spirit of God calleth Jesus * accursed: and that <sup>g</sup> no man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost.

Note.—The Corinthians were favored with a rich abundance of miraculous gifts by the power of the Holy Spirit, which they exercised principally in their public assemblies: and, as they were divided into parties, it seems that they vied with each other, in the display of these endowments. (Notes, 14:) This gave rise to vain glory, envy, corrupt emulation, and repinings, which were equally opposite to piety and charity. To remedy these grievous evils, the apostle began his observations on the subject, by reminding them of what they had been a short time before. (Notes, Gal. 4:8—11. Eph. 2:11—13.) He would not have them ignorant of the origin and proper use of spiritual gifts; (Note, 1:4—9.) for, though they prided themselves on their knowledge, they were in great danger of remaining entirely without instruction, in many practical matters of prime importance. (Marg. Ref. a, b.) They could not, however, but know, that they had in general been Gentiles, who were carried away by a blind attachment to their idols; even as they were led captive by their lusts, by their priests, and by Satan. These were dumb idols, notwithstanding all that was boasted concerning their oracles; and therefore they could not confer on their deluded votaries those gifts of tongues, and that utterance, which the converts to Christianity had now received, and which must be ascribed exclusively to the sovereign grace and power of God. It was therefore, proper for them to understand, that all such gifts were confined within the limits of the Christian church: so that no man, whether Jew or Gentile, who blasphemed the name of Jesus, or treated him as a deceiver that deserved the death of the cross, “spake by the Holy Spirit;” but his pretended or apparent inspiration must be ascribed, either to human imposture, or to diabolical agency. (Notes, John 16: 14, 15. 1 John 4:1—3.) On the other hand, no man could sincerely confess “Jesus to be the Lord;” the promised Messiah, the Son of God, according to his own declarations concerning himself; except he spoke under the influence of the Holy Spirit. The knowledge and belief of this truth, and the boldness to profess it, must come from that blessed Agent. In this important sense, all true Christians had “spiritual gifts;” and none ought either to despise another, or to think himself overlooked, if he were not favored with such as were more coveted, but less valuable.—The context, however, leads us to suppose the apostle meant, that this confession, from the mouth even of a nominal Christian, being made under the impulse of the Holy Spirit, (as wicked Balaam prophesied,) was “a spiritual gift,” which might benefit others, though it should prove of no use to the possessor.—“Nor can they, who confirm the doctrine of Christ by miracles, be acted on by any other, but the Holy Ghost: for no evil spirit would assist them to confirm a doctrine so opposite to, and destructive of, their kingdom and designs.” Whitby. (Notes, Matt. 12: 25—28. Mark 9: 38—40. Luke 9: 46—50.) The expression, “say, that Jesus is the Lord,” more obviously signifies, the profession of the true doctrine concerning Christ, than the exercise of saving faith in him, especially in a discourse concerning “spiritual gifts;” or, as some would render it, “spiritual men,” or men possessing spiritual gifts, such as are afterwards enumerated, (8—10.) to qualify them for public stations in the church (28). Many have “prophesied in the name of Christ;” as well as preached and defended his truth, who were “workers of iniquity;” yet, as far as they avowed “that Jesus was the Lord,” they spake by the Holy Spirit. (Notes, 13:1—3. Matt. 7: 21—23. 1 John 4:1—3.)—The contrast between saying “Jesus is an accursed thing;” and “Jesus is the Lord;” is very emphatical.

11 But <sup>a</sup> all these worketh that one and the self-same Spirit, dividing to every man severally <sup>b</sup> as he will. [Practical Observations.]

Note.—There was a great diversity in the spiritual gifts conferred on the Christians at Corinth and elsewhere; and some of them were valued for more than others: yet these were all from "the same Spirit," of whose operations the possessors were but instruments and vehicles. There were also different "administrations," or offices, in which men ministered to the benefit of the church, according to the work assigned, and the talents entrusted to them: but they were all the servants of Christ; and were dependent on the same Lord, and accountable to him. (Notes, Rom. 12:3—5. Eph. 4:7—16.) In the effects which followed the exercise of their gifts, whether in miraculous cures, or in the conversion of sinners; the whole was produced by the power "of the same God," who wrought all these changes on the bodies and souls of men, through his Son, and by his Spirit, for the glory of his own great name. (Marg. Ref. h—k.) But "the manifestation of the Spirit," in these extraordinary operations, was not made for the credit of the man by whom he wrought, but for the advantage of the church, and even of those without; that the person, who possessed these gifts, or filled up any office in the church, might profit others: for such gifts were entirely distinct from that gracious state of the heart, which disposes a man to improve his talents of every kind. (Marg. Ref. m.—Notes, Matt. 25:14—30.) For the purpose of thus profiting others, the Holy Spirit conferred on one "the word of wisdom;" by which may be intended such immediate discoveries of the grand scheme of salvation, attended with such powers of discoursing about it, as were suited to render other men "wise unto salvation." (Note, Eph. 3:9—12.) To another, the same Spirit gave "the word of knowledge;" by which an exact and extraordinary understanding of the Old Testament types and prophecies, and a capacity of explaining difficult subjects, of answering objections, of determining cases of conscience, or of speaking suitable words to different descriptions of persons, seems to be meant. (Marg. Ref. n.) Another was endued with a remarkable degree of faith; which rendered him capable of engaging in very perilous services, for which persons of more exact knowledge might be less competent. This kind and degree of faith was distinct from that faith which justifies; and so might be considered as "a spiritual gift," bestowed on certain persons to enable them to profit others. (Marg. Ref. o.—Note, 13:1—3.) Some were endued with the gift of performing miraculous cures: others were enabled to work miracles of divers kinds. Some predicted future events; others had a supernatural talent of discerning spirits, of perceiving by what principles men were actuated, and of what services they were capable. Some could speak in various languages, which they had not learned; and others could miraculously interpret their words to the hearers, who understood them not. (Marg. Ref. p—u.—Note, 14:26—33.) All these endowments the Holy Spirit freely bestowed, in that measure and diversity which he saw good, and to be conducive to the common advantage of the church: so that no one had any ground of glorying over others, or of repining as if he were forgotten in this distribution.—There is indeed much difficulty, at present, in determining precisely what the apostle meant by each of the terms here used, which doubtless were readily understood at the time when the gifts spoken of were exercised: but the sense which appeared most probable has been chosen; and great exactness on such a subject is not at all necessary.—"All these worketh that one and the self-same Spirit; dividing to every one severally as he will" (11); compared with, "It is the same God, which worketh all in all;" suggests a conclusive proof of the Personality, Sovereignty, and Deity of the Holy Spirit. (Marg. Ref. x, y.—Note, Eph. 1:9—12, xv. 9, 11.)

14 For <sup>f</sup> the body is not one member, but many.

Note.—The apostle next illustrated the wisdom and goodness of the Holy Spirit, in his distribution of these gifts, by the similitude of the human body. This, though formed of many members, constituted one harmonious whole: while every member had its proper use and capacity, for the common benefit. Thus Christ mystical, or his church as united to him its glorious Head, was one great whole, consisting of many parts. (15—23. Marg. Ref. z.—Notes, Rom. 12:3—5. Gal. 3:15—18.) For all true Christians had been baptized into Christ's mystical body, by the communication of his life-giving Spirit, whether they were before Jews or Gentiles, slaves or freemen; and by deriving continual supplies of that same Spirit, in answer to their earnest desires and believing prayers, they were made "to drink into one Spirit," and became more and more of "that mind which was in Christ." (Marg. Ref. b, c.—Notes, 10:1—5. Ex. 17:5,6. Cant. 5:1. Is. 44:3—5. 55:1—3. Zech. 9:13—16, v. 15. John 4:10—15. 7:37—39. Eph. 4:1—6. 5:15—20, v. 18.) Here the apostle doubtless alluded to the wine used in the Lord's supper; as before to baptism. (Notes, 10:14—21.)—Therefore as the body is one, and has one common interest, though it consists of many members; so Christians should be considered, as incorporated by faith in Christ, and "the supply of his Spirit." Whereas if they had all possessed the same gifts, they would have resembled a detached member, or several of the same kind, rather than a regularly organized body.

15 If <sup>a</sup> the foot shall say, Because I am not the hand, I am not of the body; <sup>b</sup> is it therefore not of the body?

16 And if the ear shall say, Because I am not the eye, I am not of the body; is it therefore not of the body?

17 If <sup>c</sup> the whole body were an eye, where were the hearing? If the whole were hearing, where were the smelling?

18 But now <sup>d</sup> hath God set the members, every one of them in the body, <sup>e</sup> as it hath pleased him.

19 And <sup>f</sup> if they were all one member, where were the body?

20 But now are they many members, yet but one body.

21 And <sup>g</sup> the eye cannot say unto the hand, I have no need of thee: nor again, the head to the feet, I have no need of you.

22 Nay, <sup>h</sup> much more those members of the body, which seem to be more feeble, are necessary:

23 And those members of the body, which we think to be less honorable, upon these we <sup>i</sup> bestow more abundant honor; and our uncomely parts have more abundant comeliness.

24 For <sup>j</sup> our comely parts have no need: but God hath tempered the body together, having given more abundant honor to that part which lacked:

25 That <sup>k</sup> there should be no schism in the body; but that the members should have <sup>l</sup> the same care one for another.

26 And <sup>m</sup> whether one member suffer,

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—From the preceding illustration, the Corinthians might see the folly and perniciousness of their emulations, covetings, and murmurs. For, supposing there could be a distinct consciousness in each of the members of the human body; and should "the foot," dissatisfied with its lowly, laborious, and useful station, covet the function and the powers of the hand; and complain that, as this was not granted, it could not be accounted a part of the body or at all regarded in it, must not every one see that this would be false and frivolous? The same would be the case, if the ear should repine, because not placed in the office, and possessed of the powers, of the eye. For if every part of the body were formed into an eye, where would be the important sense of hearing? Instead of such monstrous productions, God has, wisely and kindly, placed the members, senses, and organs, in the human body, "as it pleased him;" and unspeakably better than any self-wise counsellor could have directed. The very idea, of every member coveting to be the most honored part, is associated with that of the destruction of the body; which necessarily consists of many different members, so formed and placed, as to become one regular whole. (Marg. Ref. f-m.) Thus, the eye could not say, that it did not want the assistance of the hand; for without the power of executing, of which the hand is the instrument, even sight would be of small value. Nay, the head itself, the seat or source of sensation and reflection, wants the help of the feet, to convey it about from place to place. This appears still more clearly, in respect of those parts, which seem "feeble," and yet are absolutely necessary to life, or to the well-being of the whole: such as the various vessels, by which digestion, nutrition, and circulation are carried on; and by which, whatever is redundant or detrimental, is thrown off by a natural and regular process. So far, in fact, are the more honorable parts of the body from appropriating the whole of a man's regard, that the contrary often takes place: and those parts, which we are accustomed to conceal as "less honorable," are covered and decorated with the greatest care and expense. For those which are deemed most "honorable," do not want such decoration, being comely in themselves. (Marg. Ref. n-p.) And if any part of the body is wounded, diseased, or pained, all other parts sympathize with it, and share the suffering, and are ready to ease or relieve it: and, on the other hand, they all seem to rejoice, and share the pleasure of that member, which is in health and at ease; or which is employed in any honorable or beneficial service. 27 Now 'ye are the body of Christ and members in particular.

28 And <sup>u</sup> God hath set some in the church, first apostles, secondarily prophets, thirdly teachers, after that miracles, then gifts of healings, helps, governments, * diversities of tongues.

29 Are <sup>x</sup> all apostles? are all prophets? are all teachers? are all † workers of miracles?

30 Have all the gifts of healing? do all speak with tongues? do all interpret?

31 But <sup>y</sup> covet earnestly the best gifts: and yet <sup>z</sup> show I unto you a more excellent way.

Note.—The apostle here applies this most appropriate similitude to the case which he intended to illustrate. The church was the mystical body of Christ, and believers “were, in particular, members” of that body. In placing these members, God, in his sovereign and unerring wisdom, had appointed some to the first and most honorable office of apostles; to whom especially he had “given the word of wisdom,” for the instruction of mankind. Next to them, he had placed others as prophets, who gave particular instructions, by immediate inspiration, as by “the word of knowledge:” and after them he had stationed pastors and teachers, to superintend and instruct particular congregations, or to preach occasionally in other places. Besides the gifts and authority conferred on these persons; many Christians were endued with the power of working miracles, and of healing the sick: others were qualified to attend, and be assistant to, the apostles in their labors, as evangelists; or, as some explain it, to help the pastors in the office of deacons, and in various other services. Some were qualified to preside over the secular affairs of the church, as governors: or they were suitable persons to be left in authority by the apostles, when they were forced away from newly planted churches; “that they might set in order such things as were wanting:” while others were best qualified, by speaking a variety of tongues, to attempt the conversion of those who had not yet heard the gospel. (Marg. Ref. t, u.) But, would it be proper that all Christians should be apostles, prophets, teachers, or evangelists? This evidently was not the case: and if it could be thus ordered; the church would be like a body, which was all eye, all hand, or all tongue; like an army, constituted wholly of general officers; or like a kingdom in which all were rulers. (Notes, 4—11. Deut. 32:4. Rom. 12:6—8. Eph. 4:1—6, 11—16. Col. 3:12—15.)—The Christians at Corinth, indeed, “coveted earnestly,” or were emulous of the best gifts, or such as were deemed most splendid and honorable: but the apostle was about to show them a more excellent way, even that of love; (Marg. Ref. q, x.—Notes, 13:) which would influence them to be content with the gifts already conferred, and to be principally zealous in making an useful improvement of them. (Notes, 14:)—Our translation, indeed, renders the clause as an exhortation; but it may with equal exactness be translated, “Ye do covet earnestly,” &c. and so imply a reprehension of the corrupt emulation of the Corinthians: and this certainly coincides far better with the argument of the apostle. For exhorting them to “covet the best gifts;” or those that were most valued, which the Holy Spirit distributed as he saw good; would have sanctioned that ambitious temper, which he evidently aimed to repress.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

Acute speculators are often most ignorant of practical subjects: those who are most elated with the gifts bestowed on them, are commonly most forgetful of the Giver, and the proper use of them; and “spiritual gifts” have frequently been the support of spiritual pride. (Note, 27—31.)—In order to prevent these evils, we should often recollect what we were by nature and practice. We have not indeed been “carried after dumb idols:” yet “we were by nature children of wrath, even as others;” we have idolized worldly objects; and most of us have been the “enemies of God by wicked works,” after which we were carried away from the truth and will of God, even as Satan, the world, and the flesh led us. If then we have any knowledge of the truth, or any ability to communicate that knowledge to others; let us give the whole glory to God.—There have been many who advanced a claim to inspiration, or extraordinary illumination of one kind or other; and there still are those who advance such claims: but appearances of this kind must be counterfeit in all, who refuse the Lord Jesus those honors, which he demanded to himself. For, what do such men, but “call Jesus accursed?” They may speak of him as a good Man, or an able Teacher: but, while they reject his priesthood, and deny his Deity as One with the Father: what do they less than charge him with blasphemy and impostures, in evidently claiming this equality; and with abetting idolatry, in teaching “all men to honor the Son, even as they honor the Father?” (Notes, John 5:19—23. 10:26—31, v. 30.) And do they not, in effect, justify the Jewish rulers in putting him to death as "an Anathema," for saying, "I am the Son of God?" Can such men speak by the Holy Spirit, or according to the language of inspiration? But if indeed we can from our hearts say that "Jesus is the Lord;" if we adore him with Thomas, saying, "My Lord, and my God!" and if we as sinners, trust and obey him, as our divine Saviour, Teacher, and King; we may be sure that we profess his faith "by the Holy Spirit;" though we cannot explain the manner, in which he has wrought this conviction, and though we be destitute of all other spiritual gifts. Indeed, we do not now expect miraculous gifts: yet "the word of wisdom and of knowledge," and divers special endowments by "the same Spirit," according to our different services to "the same Lord," and that we may be the instruments in those "operations of the same God, who worketh all in all," may yet be depended on by us. Whatever station, therefore, be allotted us, and whatever abilities we possess for the duties of that station; we should remember, "that they were given us to profit withal." Even a capacity of speaking in a proper and scriptural manner, on any topic of religion, will not profit a man; except he have grace, humbly and simply to improve his talent, for the edification of others, without seeking his own glory or emolument. Such endowments will indeed infallibly expose the possessor to many additional temptations: and, as he will need a larger measure of grace than his more obscure brethren do, to keep him humble and spiritual; so he will probably meet with a more abundant share of painful experiences, and humiliating dispensations. We have therefore little cause to envy those, who are eminent in abilities and popularity, to covet these dangerous distinctions, to glory in any measure of them bestowed on us, or to despise such as are destitute of them. Numbers have thus been ruined: being lifted up in pride, they have come short of that salvation, which they preached to others; or they have been betrayed into such evils, as have caused them to terminate their days in disgrace and distress. And the few, who have not been apparently injured, by eminency in gifts and popularity, have generally had more to relate concerning "thorns in the flesh, and messengers of Satan to buffet them," than their less gifted and admired brethren had any conception of. (Notes, and P. O. 2 Cor. 12:1-10.)

V. 12-26.

We ought most earnestly to inquire, as our grand concern, whether we have been "baptized into the body of Christ," by his regenerating grace; and whether we are "drinking into his Spirit," by receiving daily from his fulness. If this be our privilege, we should be abundantly thankful for so valuable a distinction, and contentedly occupy the place, which it hath pleased God to assign us in his church: we should attentively consider the relation, in which we stand to the Head, and to every member of this mystical body; seek to have our hearts filled with love to the whole, and to every part, of the church of Christ; estimate soberly the functions of our station, and pray in faith and hope for wisdom and grace, that we may be enabled to perform them. We should also watch against pride, ambition, envy, discontent, selfishness, contempt of others; and thus seek the good of the church, of those in our own sphere of action, and of every individual, by properly improving our talents, and performing the duty of our station. If situated in the lowest place, we should not disdain its services as beneath us: if advanced to a higher station; we should not imagine, that we do not stand in need of the prayers and help of our feeblest and most obscure brethren; for these are essential to the perfection of the whole. Nay, we should guard and take care of the weak and feeble believer; even as the God of nature has, with exquisite skill and kindness, defended those parts of the body, which, though essential to life and health, might otherwise easily be wounded and destroyed; and cover with affectionate attention the infirmities and uncomeliness of those, whom we have reason to regard as real believers, and who are exposed to disgrace and contempt: that so "the more abundant honor may be given to that part which lacked;" seeing the more honorable of our brethren have no need of such particular assistance and support from us. Our kind Creator hath effectually provided, that there should be "no schism in" our natural body: but he has for wise reasons seen good to make trial of the members of the mystical body of Christ, in this respect; and through the remainder of error and sin in real Christians, through the intrusion of hypocrites, and the artifices of the enemy, many disgraceful and lamentable divisions still prevail; which we should pray against, and endeavor to heal, to the utmost of our power, and with persevering earnestness. (Note and P. O. Eph. 4:1-6.)

V. 27-31.

In proportion as the members of Christ have not the same care of others as of themselves, very injurious consequences will manifestly ensue. If all filled up their several places in entire and equal love; there could be no envyings, jealousies, murmurs, vain-glory, self-seeking, or disregard of others, any more than there is in heaven. (Note, Matt. 6:10.) We should, in that case, every one reciprocally care for all the rest; we should sympathize with the afflicted, tempted, distressed, or fallen believer, and help him as we could; we should feel ourselves sharers in the disgrace and reproach of the poor and needy; deem ourselves honored and prospered, in the reputation, success, and usefulness of our more distinguished brethren; and rejoice in the consolation of such as were glad in the Lord. The meanest Christian would not then repine, or envy the most exalted; but rejoice and bless God on his account: the most eminent would not disregard the meanest; but would peculiarly endeavor to encourage and help him. Thus the good of the whole, and of every part, would be the uniform object of all, in every station, without any exception; and with the subordination of all personal interests and satisfactions to this superior end. Instead of "coveting earnestly" the highest stations, or the most conspicuous gifts; instead of acting, as if all were to be apostles, prophets, teachers, and rulers; we should then unreservedly leave the appointment of his servants to God, and those whom he employs in his providence: and we should choose "the most excellent" way of love; endeavoring to occupy with our measure of ability and influence, for the good of our brethren, till our Lord come: remembering, that they will not be most approved and commended at that time, who affected or occupied the chief places; but those who have been most faithful to the trust reposed in them, and most diligent in their Master's work. (Note, Matt. 20:24—28.)

CHAP. XIII.

Gifts and miraculous powers, without love, are of no worth, or efficacy, 1—3. The excellent properties of love, 4—7. Love will abide, when prophecies and tongues shall cease, and knowledge shall be perfected, 8—12. It is greater than faith and hope, 13.

Note.—The more effectually to expose the radical error of the Corinthians, in over-valuing spiritual gifts, and seeking their own credit in the use of them, without due regard to the benefit of their brethren; the apostle, in this chapter, declares the most eminent of these gifts to be comparatively nothing, and "love" to be every thing. (Notes, 2:3—5, 12:27—31, 14:1—5, 2 Cor. 10:7—11.) He had told them, that he would "show them a more excellent way;" and he here averred, (as concerning himself, to give the less offence,) that if he could speak all the variety of human languages most perfectly; and if he could discourse in them with the eloquence of angels, or even use their heavenly language; yet, without love, he should merely resemble the unmeaning sound of the most common and less harmonious musical instruments. (Notes, 14:6—12, Acts 2:4—11.) Nay, could he also deliver prophecies, which should be verified by the most signal accomplishment; if he could understand, and even comprehend, all divine mysteries; if he were possessed of all the natural and religious knowledge imaginable; and if he could exercise that special faith on the power of Christ, by which miracles were wrought, to such a degree, that even mountains should literally be removed at his word, to the universal astonishment of mankind; yet without "love" he should be nothing, not a Christian at all, and so far beneath the meanest believer upon earth.

(Marg. Ref. a—n.—Notes, 8:1—3, 12:4—11, Matt. 7:21—23, 21:21—22, Mark 11:20—26, Luke 17:5,6, Eph. 3:1—7.)—Nay, if from pride, ostentation, or similar motives, he should "give all his goods to feed the poor," even to the starving of himself, from selfish motives; or if, from party-zeal and obstinate attachment to a system, he should "give his body to be burned" as a martyr; yet, without "love," he could be nothing better than a deluded enthusiast, or ambitious hypocrite, and should derive no benefit from it. The apostle meant to show, in the strongest instances imaginable, that nothing could prove a man a true believer, who had not love. Some of the cases which he states cannot be supposed to have ever existed: yet it seems evident from scripture, that a man might have the largest degree of that faith, by which miracles were performed, without any of the "faith which worketh by love;" and that it is possible for a person to expend all his wealth in alms, and die a martyr not only for error and superstition, but even for the truth, without saving grace!—The word "charity" has been of late so appropriated to one external expression of love, which yet may be produced from other principles; that it is desirable for the word "love" to be here substituted, according to the exact meaning of the original, in order to render the passage more intelligible to common readers.—It must here be taken in the noblest sense, for such a love to the whole church, and the whole world, as arises from principles of true piety, and ultimately centres in God. [Practical Observations.]

Note.—The effects of "love," here enumerated, show that the apostle primarily intended those exercises of that holy affection, which respect mankind. Yet it is equally evident, that no natural benevolence, which subsists in an unbeliever's heart, can at all answer to the description which he has given. Indeed he evidently meant that love, which is "the fruit of the Spirit" in the believer's heart, and by which especially "faith worketh." (Notes, Gal. 5:1—6, v. 6, 22—26, v. 22. 1 Pet. 1:22. 1 John 3:13—15. 4:7, 8.) The humble penitent, obtaining pardon and peace by faith in Christ, finds his self-confidence and his attachment to the world deprived of dominion and greatly weakened: he is also taught to love the perfections, the holiness, and the cause of God; the person, truth, and precepts of Christ, and his image in his people; to love his neighbors, and even his enemies, after the example of Christ and in obedience to his commands; and he now desires, that they should all be happy, and that God should be glorified in their salvation. This love therefore includes all parties, nations, and characters, in its expansive exercise; though still capable of more particular attachments. It regards both the temporal and eternal interests of mankind; and the external comfort, as well as spiritual advantage, of believers: and, in subordination to the love of God, it seeks to promote the benefit of mankind, and the peace and prosperity of the church, as its grand objects. This love is the unequivocal evidence of regeneration; and it is a better touchstone of men's professed faith in Christ, than even the love of God; because its effects may more easily be examined and ascertained, and there is less danger of false affections in it. (Notes, 1 John 3:16, 17. 4:20, 21.) It was also that part of the Christian temper, in which the Corinthians were peculiarly defective: the apostle therefore selected this subject, to show them how low an estimate ought to be made of their religion, and so to abate their high opinion of themselves.—We must further observe that he described "love" as a man would gold, by enumerating its properties in the abstract. Wherever it subsisted, it had those properties, whether its quantity were small or great: and by this a man might estimate his own attainments in real religion. Some love might exist, where great remains of selfish passions obstructed its exercise; as a little gold may be mixed with a large alloy of base metal: but it would then become less conspicuous, and the man's state more doubtful.—"Love suffereth long;" it influences us, as far as it prevails, to endure the most grievous injuries and provoking affronts for a long time together, without resentment or retaliation. (Marg. Ref. m.—Notes, Ex. 34:5—7. Ps. 86:14, 15. Rom. 2:4—6. Col. 3:12—15.) Love

"is kind," even to the most injurious; persevering in endeavors "to overcome evil with good;" and delighting in showing kindness to all sorts of persons, by word and deed. (Marg. Ref. n.—Notes, Rom. 12:9—21. Eph. 4:30—32. 5:1, 2.) "Love envieth not;" or, is not emulous and ambitious: as far as it rules in the heart, it represses pride and selfishness; and causes men to rejoice in the comfort, advantage, and honor even of those, whom nature would regard as enemies or rivals. "Love vaunteth not itself;" it is a humble, unostentatious principle; it never prompts a man to boast, to push himself into notice, to prefer himself to others, to act with rashness or insolence, or in an overbearing dogmatical spirit. "It is not puffed up;" it never leads a person to be elated by endowments, offices, applause, or popularity: for where love prevails, these are only regarded and valued as means of good to others, communicated from God, to whom all the honor of them belongs. (Notes, 4:6—8, 18—21. 5:1—5. 8:1—3. 2 Cor. 12:17—21.) "Love doth not behave itself unseemly;" it guides a man to a gentle, beneficent, courteous, compassionate, respectful conduct, suited to his employment, relative duties, age, and station: and thus it preserves him from rashness, and those improprieties into which pride and selfishness betray others. (Marg. Ref. o, p.) For he, who is influenced by love, will keep the good of mankind continually before him as his object: and this will restrain him from those evil tempers and unbecoming actions, which would counteract his grand design. Love "seeketh not its own;" it never prompts men to seek their own ease, interest, credit, or indulgence, except in subordination to the welfare of others and the glory of God: and it does not allow them to seek any selfish end, in the use of their gifts and talents, which are conferred on them to profit others with. (Marg. Ref. r.—Notes, 10:23—28. Phil. 2:1—4.) Love "is not easily provoked;" it is not passionate and furious, any more than revengeful; it does not readily take offence even at many or great affronts, which pride and self-love would deem intolerable. Love "thinketh no evil;" it is unsuspecting, and not apt to impute men's conduct to bad motives, without evident proof: it can therefore never prompt any one to invent or circulate slanders, to believe malicious reports, or even needlessly to expose the faults of others; but it will rather influence him to extenuate or conceal them, when this can be done consistently with other duties. (Note, Matt. 7:1, 2.) For love "rejoiceth not in iniquity;" it is not gratified, (as pride and malevolence are,) with the report of the vices and follies of others, though belonging to another party, or regarded as opposers; it rather influences a man to weep over it, and to desire that it should be found erroneous. "But love rejoiceth in the truth;" it excites joy in the heart, when the triumphs of the truth, and the holy lives of such as profess it, are mentioned, or when aspersed characters are vindicated by the truth being made known; or when Christians, however distinguished, act with truth, sincerity, integrity, professing and adorning the truth of the gospel. (Marg. Ref. s—x.) "Love beareth all things:" it covers all faults, as far as it can properly be done: it bears with the infirmities and mistakes of others, with candor and kindness; and it submits to any inconvenience cheerfully, which this forbearance imposes. (Notes, Prov. 10:12. Rom. 15:1—3. Gal. 6:1—5. 1 Pet. 4:8.) Love "believeth all things:" it disposes a person to believe the most favorably of all others, till the contrary be proved; to act as counsel for the accused; and even to credit a man's apologies for his faults, his professions of repentance, and his purposes of amendment. (Note, Luke 17:3,4.) "Love hopeth all things:" it prompts a man to hope the best of another's character and intentions, which the case will fairly allow him; to hope for the conversion of the sinner, or the recovery of the backslider; to proceed with hope, in his attempts to do good to the most profligate, obstinate, and ungrateful: and it allows no one to despair of others, to be wearied out by their perverseness, or to give up all endeavors for their good: and so consign sinners of every description, as hopeless, to inevitable and eternal destruction. (Note, Luke 15:25—32.) In this desire and hope of finally succeeding, at least in some instances, "love endureth all things:" it influences a man to bear any poverty, reproach, persecution, hardship, suffering, or even death, in seeking to do good to the bodies and souls of men, after the example of Christ, and in obedience to his commandments. (Marg. Ref. y—a.)—It is obvious to every attentive reader, that, in this beautiful description of the properties and effects of love, the apostle meant to show the Corinthians, that their conduct had, in most particulars, been an entire contrast to it. (Notes, Gal. 5:13—18. Jam. 3:13—18.)—He seems also, without intending it, to have delineated his own character, as a successful imitator of the Lord Jesus, the perfect pattern of this holy love. (Note, 11:1.) Love, as exercised by Christians, not the love of God to man, must be meant; and the admired accommodation of it to the latter by some eloquent writers, leads the reader away from the intended instruction of the passage, however excellent in other respects.

there be prophecies, they shall fail; whether there be <sup>c</sup> tongues, they shall cease: whether there be knowledge, it shall <sup>d</sup> vanish away.

9 For <sup>e</sup> we know in part, and we prophesy in part:

10 But <sup>f</sup> when that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away.

11 When I was a child, <sup>g</sup> I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I <sup>h</sup> thought as a child: but when I became a man, I put away childish things.

12 For now <sup>h</sup> we see through a glass, † darkly; but then <sup>i</sup> face to face: <sup>k</sup> now I know in part; but then shall I know even as also I am known.

Note.—The "love," which the apostle so warmly recommended, "never faileth:" it never loses its value or excellency: it will never be changed for any other thing; nor will it ever fail out of that heart, in which it has taken root: (Note, Eph. 3:14—19.) and especially it will endure for ever in heaven. But even "prophecy" would fail: the Spirit of prophecy would soon be withdrawn from the church; the instructions, given by the prophets from immediate revelation, would soon be superseded by more ordinary methods; and even the prophecies of the scripture would all at length be accomplished, and, having answered their end, be of no further use. The gift of "tongues" was of no long continuance in the church; and in heaven no acquaintance with human languages will be of any value. That philosophical "knowledge," on which the Corinthians prided themselves, soon vanished as a dream: and even that kind and degree of religious knowledge, which is acquired on earth, will be eclipsed by the perfect knowledge of heaven, as the light of the stars by the blaze of noon: or the knowledge, by which some were qualified to teach others the truth and will of God, will at length be of no further use. Here indeed the servants of God "knew in part, and so prophesied in part:" they had a small portion of his ways, works, and counsels made known to them; but when the perfect discoveries of another world are made, all this is done away, as the useless taper in the day-time. (Marg. Ref. b—f.) This might be illustrated by the difference between the apprehensions of a child, and those of a man. The apostle himself could recollect, that when he was a child, he had talked in a childish and unsuitable manner about the affairs of men; and he had conceived of them, been affected by them, and reasoned about them, with much ignorance and misapprehension: but when he became a man, he not only put away his toys and childish pursuits, but his childish manner of speaking, thinking, and judging; as one ashamed of the impertinence and folly which had mixed with even the little knowledge that he had acquired. Thus on earth, he could conceive and speak only "as a child," about divine things, when his present knowledge was compared with that of heaven. (Marg. Ref. g.) Though preserved from all error in delivering the doctrine to mankind, by preaching or writing: he was aware, that he should find his views of them inadequate, unsuitable, and widely different from the real nature and glory of those sublime objects of contemplation. For he could here only see them "through a glass darkly;" as by the imperfect reflection of a mirror, or in the obscure description of a riddle. (Notes, Judg. 14:10-14. Ps. 49:1-4. Matt. 13:34, 35.)—This view of them by faith, through revelation and by divine teaching, is sufficient for the present state; but it is inadequate and obscure, compared with that view of them, which is obtained by those, who "see face to face;" and who have an immediate, intuitive, and complete perception of God, of Christ, and of heavenly things. (Marg. Ref. h-k.) So that even the apostle's "knowledge in part," of the truths and purposes of God, would be as nothing, when he came "to know, as he was known;" and to perceive those objects, with that clearness, fulness, and adequate conception of them, which corresponds to the perfect knowledge of God himself, as far as a finite mind can comprehend infinity. (Note, 1 John 3:1-3.)

Note.—Not only is "love" more excellent and more enduring, than all spiritual gifts, miraculous powers, and prophetic discoveries; but it even far exceeds in value all other Christian graces. After the ceasing of supernatural gifts in the church, "faith, hope, and love would abide," to the end of the world, as the three principal graces which distinguish Christians from all other men, and, in fact, as including all the others.—Faith cordially and practically receives the "sure testimony of God" concerning invisible things, appropriates his instruction, and thus welcomes his salvation, by looking to the divine Redeemer, and relying on him and the promises of God in him. (Marg. Ref. l, m.—Notes, John 3:27-36, vv. 35,36. Heb. 11:1,2. 1 John 5:9-12.)—Hope, with longing and patient waiting, expects the promised blessings, as to be perfected in eternal life; and thus it is the "anchor of the soul," keeping it steadfast in obedience and patient waiting, amidst every kind of opposition and discouragement. (Marg. Ref. n.—Notes, Heb. 6:16-20. 1 John 3:1-3.) And love to God, and to mankind for his sake, as before described, is the active principle of all those willing services, in which the Christian does good to others, according to the will of God. "These three abide," and must abide, as essential to godliness, under every dispensation, and in every age; whatever other changes take place: but "the greatest of these is love." (Marg. Ref. o, p.) Not that love can do the office of faith, in justifying the sinner, or do any thing towards it; any more than the eye can perform the function of the ear: nor can this "love" be found in any man, who is not partaker of faith and hope. But faith and hope are the means, or the intermediate acts of the mind, by which a proud, selfish, carnal, condemned criminal, is brought to love a reconciled God, and to love men in general, and Christians in particular, for his sake. They are as the scaffolding, without which the building cannot be erected: yet the building is more valuable than the scaffolding, and when that is completed, the other will be taken down as of no further use. For love is the very nature and image of God, "the bond of perfection," the essence of holiness, "the fulfilling of the law." Faith and hope are only requisite for us, as sinners, in this imperfect state: faith will therefore soon be lost in vision, and hope swallowed up in fruition; but perfect love will flourish for ever, the business, element, joy, and glory of heaven itself; uniting God and all holy creatures in the most perfect harmony and felicity, without the least alloy of any contrary principle, through all the ages of eternity. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-7.

Splendid abilities, extensive learning, admired eloquence, and even exact "knowledge in the mysteries of God," may be possessed by a proud and selfish man; who is as "sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal," in the most admired displays of his conspicuous endowments. Indeed, the powers or eloquence of angels, and all imaginable gifts of miracles or prophecy, cannot demonstrate a man to be at all better than Balaam or Judas: and even the most astonishing liberality or patient fortitude, under self-invented or imposed austerities, nay, persecution even to tortures and death, may spring from other motives and principles than holy love, and in that case will avail nothing before our heart-searching Judge. How then are they deluded, who expect acceptance and reward, for those good works, which are as scanty in their degree, as they are corrupt and selfish in their principle! And how are even true Christians often fascinated, to over-rate ostentatious eloquence, gifts, and abilities, and to undervalue honest, simple, and unadorned love which seeks only to do them good!—But where does this heavenly love reside, which the apostle so warmly panegyricizes? Is she returned to heaven, being wearied out with our contentions and selfishness on earth? Or does she dwell in some obscure retreat, at a distance from the disputes of the world, and of the church? Certainly she is but seldom seen among us; she has but few votaries and little influence; and is treated with strange neglect almost every where. Alas! numbers, who might be supposed "to be somewhat," if we only looked at their talents, knowledge, and zeal; appear to be "nothing," or very little, if "love" be the touchstone of their characters.—Indeed, this chapter may be considered as an answer to all the wrangling pamphlets of angry disputers about religious truth, of different names and sentiments. Many of these seem incapable of long-suffering or kindness to any but their own party: so that envy, boasting, railing, ridicule, slander, and acrimony, are the prominent features of the portrait, which they exhibit to the view of the public! In the most unseemly manner, they sound their own praises; vent their own resentments; expose and triumph over their opponents; forget all decent regard to superiors; and turn religious investigation into a vain-glorious, selfish, if not scurrilous, contest for victory! It is evident, that many of this character are "easily provoked," and hardly pacified that they think evil of others, and rejoice in detecting the faults and follies of those who differ from them. In short, the attentive observer will perceive that every part of the apostle's definition of love forms a complete contrast to the conduct of great numbers, who, in different ages, have had numerous admirers, for their zeal and ability, in contending for the sentiments or forms of their own sect or party.—But alas! we need far more "love" than is generally possessed, to animadvert on such abuses, without being betrayed into a measure of imitation. Let us then rather inquire, whether this divine love inhabit and influence our hearts? Have we learned to suffer long and to be kind? Are we taught to repress envy and unholy emulation, and to rejoice in the superior reputation and success of our brethren? Has love instructed us "in honor to esteem others better than ourselves," and brought under all insolence, rashness, and ostentation? Has this divine principle guided us into a becoming behavior, to our superiors, equals, inferiors, opponents, competitors, friends, relatives, and all orders of men in the church or the community? Have we attained the habit of giving up our own interest or inclination, whenever the good of others requires it? Can we bear affronts, without being "easily provoked?" Are we disposed to be unsuspecting; to mourn over the sins of others; to bear with their infirmities, dulness, and perverseness; to "believe, hope, and endure all things" for their sakes? If some sparks of this heavenly flame have been kindled in our hearts; we know that there is much of a contrary nature, to counteract its efficacy. Here then is a call for watchfulness, diligence, and prayer; that our "love may abound yet more and more, in knowledge, and in all judgment;" and that our selfish nature may be more entirely subdued and mortified. (Notes, Phil. 1:9—11, v. 9. 1 Thes. 4:9—11. 2 Thes. 1:3,4. 1 Pet. 1:22,23.) Hence we shall also see still more our need of the cleansing blood of Christ: and shall learn to walk humbly before God, and to bear with others; as conscious that we need the patient forbearance both of the Lord, and of our brethren.

V. 8—13.

If love, as before described, is planted in our hearts, though as an exotic in an unfriendly soil and climate; it will "never fail," but certainly grow up to maturity; and it will flourish abundantly, when prophecies shall cease, when human science and eloquence shall vanish away; and when even our highest attainments in divine knowledge in this present world, (which are indeed very small compared with those of the apostle,) will appear like the lisplings, the imaginations, and the reasonings of a little child.—But, if that feeble indistinct view which we obtain by faith, when looking in the mirror of the sacred word, be so delightful, as we have sometimes found it; with what raptures shall we "see face to face," and "know even as we are known!" Let us then "put away the childish things," which amused us in an unconverted state; for so we now clearly see them to have been: let us learn to value things according to their intrinsic worth; and not, as children, admire all that glitters whether it be gold or tinsel: let us cease from our childish pursuits about externals and non-essentials; that we may value and seek an increase of faith, hope, and love from the Giver of all good gifts: and while we contend, that "faith alone justifies" the sinner, by forming his relation to the Saviour; and that hope only can support the soul, amidst all the trials of life and death; let us remember, that love is still greater than these most needful graces, being the evidence of our title to eternal life, the meetness for that holy and unspeakable felicity, and the blessed earnest and beginning of it.

CHAP. XIV.

The apostle exhorts the Corinthians to follow after love; and shows that prophecy, as most conducive to edification, is to be preferred to "speaking with tongues," 1—5. Speaking in a language, which the hearers do not understand, resembles indistinct musical sounds, and is of no use to the hearers, 6—11. All gifts should be used in the most edifying manner, 12—20. Tongues are intended to convince unbelievers; but prophesying is more useful in the public assembly, and to strangers who resort thither, 21—25. Rules for the orderly exercise of spiritual gifts in the church, 26—33. Women are forbidden to speak in public, 31,35. A reproof of the self-sufficiency of some teachers at Corinth, 36—38. Gifts must be exercised, and all things done "decently and in order," 39,40.

4 He that speaketh in an unknown tongue <sup>k</sup> edifieth himself; but he that prophesieth <sup>l</sup> edifieth the church.

Note.—Having shown the pre-eminent excellency of "love," the apostle exhorted the Corinthians "to follow after" it, as the great object of their unremitting pursuit, in preference to all other things: and then they would do well, in "earnestly desiring spiritual gifts," that they might be useful to their brethren; for under the influence of "love," they would certainly thus use them. (Marg. Ref. a—c.) But especially they should value "the gift of prophesying." By this the apostle seems to have intended, an immediate communication from the Spirit of God, concerning the meaning of the holy scriptures, or some point of doctrine or practice, in which the church or individuals wanted instruction at the time. This was a gift bestowed on several, by which they became occasional or extraordinary teachers in the church: and it appears to have been generally accompanied by the power of predicting future events, when circumstances required it. (Marg. Ref. d.—Note, 1 Thes. 5:16—22, v. 20.) The Corinthians, however, did not value it so much as "the gift of tongues," or of miracles; because it was less suited to excite admiration: but the apostle instructed them, that it was greatly to be preferred by them, because more useful in their situation. For he who spake in a language, which the hearers could not understand, "did not speak to men, but unto God" only; nor would others receive any benefit, even if indeed, under the impulse of the Holy Spirit, he spake the most sublime mysteries of the gospel, in the most suitable words. (Marg. Ref. e, f.—Note, Acts 2:6—11.) Whereas "he that prophesied" spake to men, to edify them in divine truth, to exhort them to holy practice, or to animate and comfort them under their trials and conflicts. (Marg. Ref. g—i.) Indeed, he, who spake in an unknown tongue, might derive instruction and benefit from his own words, and his faith might be established by the exercise of this miraculous gift; in case he was not elated with pride, and influenced by ostentation. But he who prophesied would edify many, which was far more desirable. As the apostle rejoiced in every thing conducive to their prosperity, he desired that they might all be endued with the gift of tongues: but still more, that they might all be capable of instructing others, by the gift of prophesying. (Note, 12:4—11.) For the prophet was certainly a more honorable and useful person, than he who spake with tongues; except the latter were also endued with the gift of interpreting his discourse, into the language understood by his hearers; that so the church might be edified by what he spake. (Marg. Ref. m, o.) It seems that this was not generally the case: indeed a man might be miraculously enabled to speak in one, two, or more languages, which he had never learned: and yet, being left ignorant of other languages, he might be unable to explain his meaning to those, who neither understood the language in which he spake, nor that which was his native tongue. Or perhaps, to counterpoise a gift, which was so much calculated to elate the possessors, they might be left incapable of giving utterance, with propriety, perspicuity, or promptitude, suited to a public assembly, even in their native tongue, to those divine truths which they spake fluently in another language, under the influence of the Holy Spirit: and another man might be miraculously enabled to understand, and interpret into the language of the audience, what was thus spoken, who yet himself might be unable to speak fluently, in the language which he interpreted. Even in ordinary cases, clearly understanding a language, and being able to speak fluently in it, are very distinct attainments.—'Why was the gift of tongues conferred? That the mysteries of God might be openly made known to more people and nations. Then surely, prophecy, to which the gift of tongues was intended to be subservient, must be of superior excellency.' Beza. 'This therefore was a great abuse of this gift, that when they had a mystery revealed to them, they did not utter it in a language understood by the assembly, but only by themselves: and so they did not edify the church by it, though it was given, as all the other gifts were, for edification. (12:7.)' Whitby.—Follow after. (1) Pursue love. (Note, Heb. 12:14.) 'The word διωξετε properly signifies, to pursue with an eagerness, like that with which hunters follow their game. And it may be intended to intimate, how hard it is to obtain, and preserve a truly benevolent spirit in the main series of life; considering on the one hand the many provocations we are like to meet with; and on the other, the force of self-love, which will, in so many instances, be ready to break in upon it.' Doddridge.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—To convince the Christians at Corinth, without giving them needless offence, of what he had advanced, the apostle put the case, that if, when he should come to see them, he should merely display his gift of speaking in a variety of languages; of what use would his visit be to them? Surely of none; except he spake intelligibly, either by immediate “revelation” from God, or from his superior “knowledge” in the mysteries of God; (Notes, Eph. 3:1—7.) or by some prophetic message suited to their case; or concerning some “doctrine,” in which they wavered, or were mistaken. Unless, in some of these ways, (which indeed it is difficult to distinguish with exactness,) he gave them clear instructions; all that he could say would be an unmeaning noise, even if the languages in which he spake were understood; much more if they did not understand them. (Marg. Ref. p—t.) For even “lifeless things,” which are made use of to give sound, as, for instance, musical instruments, can give no direction to those who are to sing or dance to them, unless a proper distinction be observed in the sounds. And if the trumpet should be blown at random, without any distinction between that sound which calls the combatants to the field, and that which sounds a retreat, and other sounds of different meaning; what soldier could understand when to “prepare himself for the battle?” If then, an intelligible distinction of sounds was necessary in the ordinary concerns of life, much more must they be so in those of religion. For unless the speakers uttered significant and intelligible words, how could the hearers understand what was spoken? They might as well speak in an empty room, or an unfrequented desert; where their words would be lost in the air, and never reach any human ear. (Marg. Ref. u—z.) There were indeed many languages, or dialects, according to the different regions of the earth; and each of these was significant to the persons accustomed to it. That circumstance therefore ought to be considered: otherwise, even in ordinary conversation, the speaker and hearer, who did not understand each other, would appear reciprocally barbarians to each other; however expressive, polite, and copious, the languages were in which they spake: and they would be more likely to despise one another, than to profit by the interview, or be satisfied with it. (Marg. Ref. a.—Note, Acts 28:1,2.) In the common concerns of life, it was thus absolutely requisite for men to understand each other; and surely the Corinthians, amidst their zeal, and emulous desire of spiritual gifts, ought to act consistently with the common sense of mankind, and desire to excel in those things, by which they might edify the church; and not in such as could only procure to themselves irrational admiration!—‘At this day, among the ‘papists, they are used, in their sermons, always to quote the sacred scriptures in Latin, ‘without adding a translation in the vulgar ‘tongue; nor do they use any other method, in ‘the singing and prayers.’ Beza.—‘If you, that ‘have the gift of strange languages, do not ‘speak ... that which the auditors may understand; (for to that end were those languages given,) that you might speak to every ‘one in his own language; (Acts 2:6.) how ‘shall any one be better for your language?’ Hammond.—It should be carefully noted, how decidedly the apostle prefers those gifts, and that exercise of gifts, which were suited to instruct and edify others; to those, which were more admired, but less suited to do substantial good.

15 'What is it then? ' I will pray with the spirit, and I will pray with the understanding also: I will sing with the spirit, <sup>b</sup> and I will sing with the understanding also.

17 For thou verily givest thanks well, <sup>m</sup> but the other is not edified.

18 I <sup>n</sup> thank my God, I speak with tongues more than you all:

19 Yet <sup>o</sup> in the church I had rather speak five words with my understanding, that by my voice I might teach others also, than ten thousand words in an unknown tongue.

Note.—If any of the Corinthians would speak in an unknown tongue among their brethren, let them pray to be endued also with the gift of interpreting what was spoken, or what others delivered in a foreign language; that their religious exercises might not be a mere display of gifts, without meaning or use. Supposing the apostle should come among them, and pray with the congregation in an unknown tongue; his spirit, or heart, might indeed be very devoutly engaged in the worship of God, while exercising this gift of the Holy Spirit: but, as others could not understand him, so, his own understanding would be unfruitful, having no just and proper exercise, and producing no benefit to his fellow-worshippers. What would then be the proper inference from this observation? Truly, he would pray from the fulness of spiritual affections; and in the sober exercise of his understanding also, by using such words as might edify others, and enable them to join with him. In like manner, when he sang the praises of God, he would endeavor to have his spiritual affections engaged as much as possible; yet he would also consider, as a rational man, what language would be best understood by the congregation. (Marg. Ref. d—h.) Now if any, neglecting this obvious dictate of discretion, should celebrate the praises of God, and return thanks for his mercies, in the most spiritual and fervent manner, but in an "unknown tongue;" how could he who occupied the place of a private believer, who had neither learning, nor the gift of tongues, give his assent to the thanksgiving, by saying, Amen, as it was customary among them; (Marg. Ref. h—l;) seeing he had not understood any thing which was spoken? The one might give thanks in a very proper manner, but the other could derive no benefit from it.—Many indeed of the Corinthians supposed themselves to excel in this particular gift, and were pleased to make a show of it: but the apostle thanked God, that, as commissioned to preach to the Gentiles, of whatever nation, he "spake with tongues more than they all," and was enabled to preach in more languages; the whole praise of which he gave to the Lord. Yet he had rather "speak five words," or the shortest instructive sentence, among believers, in the public assembly, in a rational manner, so that others might understand him, and be edified by what he said; than irrationally to speak ten thousand words, or the most copious discourse, "in an unknown tongue" which could be of no use to them.—Had the apostle lived about the era of the reformation, and written expressly against the church of Rome; he could not more emphatically have exposed the absurdity, and wickedness, of worshipping God, and performing all public services in Latin; of which the common people understand not one word. No wonder the rulers of that church lock up the scriptures also in an unknown tongue, seeing they must otherwise bear too evident a testimony against them.—With the understanding. (15) That is, say most commentators, so as to be understood. This indeed is implied, and principally intended; yet an example of such an use of the words, cannot easily be adduced. But might not the apostle mean, that they, who spoke publicly in a language not understood by the auditors, however fervent their affections, or excellent their gifts might be, seemed to act like men without understanding, or who made no use of their understanding; seeing no man, however irrational and enthusiastical, could act more evidently against the plain dictates of sober reason and sound judgment?—Does not the apostle's argument, about prayer without any preconceived form, fully show, that if any one prayed, or gave thanks, in a language understood by the congregation, the people might, if nothing else prevented, cordially say Amen to his words? And does not this remark sufficiently answer many common objections and arguments against prayer of this kind? It, however, by no means decides, whether that, or a liturgy, as to public worship, is most conducive to general edification, in the present state of the church.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—These repeated intimations of the ignorance and childish conduct of the Corinthians, who were evidently in no small degree disposed to self-wisdom, are well worthy of notice. (Note, 4:8.)—As they presumed, that they had superior knowledge, let them not be “children in understanding;” for it was as trifling and vain, to make a show of the gift of tongues, merely to astonish those who could not understand them; as any of the competitions and amusements of children could be. Let them indeed be as infants in respect of malice, and every evil disposition; being of a gentle forgiving disposition, without resentment or rancor: but let them be “men in understanding;” as matured in judgment and experience, and capable of acting with propriety and wisdom in all things. (Marg. Ref. p, q.—Notes, 13:8—12. Rom. 16:17—20.) In the law, or in the Old Testament, God had foretold, that he would speak to Israel “by men of other lips, and yet even then they would not hear him.” This seems primarily to have related to the languages of those foreign nations, by whom God intended to execute vengeance on Israel: but it might also denote, that he would instruct them by persons endued with the gift of tongues, to convince them that the persons thus endued, taught the true religion, and were the servants of “the One living and true God.” So that this gift, when exercised among such as did not understand what was spoken, was to be considered rather as a rebuke than as a favor: but in its proper use, it was intended for a sign to unbelievers, in order to their conversion; whereas, prophesying was more immediately intended for the edification of believers. (Marg. Ref. s, t.)—Yet the gift of tongues might be so perverted, as even to prove exceedingly injurious to unbelievers. If, for instance, the church at Corinth should be assembled in one place; and all, who were able, should speak with tongues, several at once, and others in succession, while the rest did not understand what was spoken: and if any person, uninstructed in Christianity, or disposed to reject it, should come in to make observations; would not such irrational and confused proceedings confirm his prejudices, and cause him to conclude, that they were a company of madmen, or frantic enthusiasts? (Marg. Ref. y.—Note, Acts 2:12,13.) But if they all prophesied, and one teacher after another, spake by the Spirit of God, in a pertinent, instructive, and convincing manner, on some point of doctrine or practice; the stranger who occasionally came among them, would hear from every one, that which was suited to convince his understanding, to awaken his conscience, and to move his affections: he would find his secret objections answered, his secret thoughts divulged, his secret sins reprov'd, and the real state of his heart and soul made known to him, though before they had been unperceived. And this might be expected, by the divine blessing, to produce a full persuasion of the truth and excellency of the gospel: so that, it would often happen, that the curious or ignorant despiser would be suddenly changed into a humble worshipper; and that under his deep conviction, he would even prostrate himself in adoration of the living God; acknowledging that the glorious Lord was evidently present, in the midst of the assembled Christians; and evidently spake by them for the instruction of the hearers. Note.—How then ought the public assemblies of Christians to be ordered and conducted? When they came together, all who were endued with gifts eagerly seized the opportunity of exercising them; so that one would begin to sing a psalm or spiritual song; another to discourse on some doctrines; another to speak in an unknown tongue; another to declare some special revelation which had been made to him; and another to interpret what had been spoken. Thus several would speak at the same time, in different parts of the assembly: and while every one was more desirous to be heard and admired, than to hear and be edified, the whole scene became confused; and the great end of their coming together was overlooked. (Note, Jam. 1:19—21.)—As a general rule by which such abuses might be remedied, they ought always to take care, “that all things were done” with a view to the edification of those who were present. (Marg. Ref. d.) If then, any of them chose to “speak in an unknown tongue;” let no more than two, or at most three, one after another, exercise this gift at one time of assembling; and let some one interpret. But if none present were enabled to do this, let him, who was about “to speak in an unknown tongue,” be silent; and be content to speak to himself and to God in meditation and prayer; without obtruding his unintelligible words upon the congregation, who might be more profitably employed. Let the prophets also speak by two or three at the same time of meeting, in due order; and let those prophets especially, who were silent, exercise their judgment upon what was spoken, to determine whether it accorded with the scripture; as false prophets might creep in among them. (Marg. Ref. e—g.) In case any thing should be immediately “revealed to” one who sat by, which required present attention; let the first, on a proper intimation given, “keep silence,” till that had been considered: or, as some render it, let the other wait till the first had done speaking. For there was no reason, why any one should be eager to speak first; seeing by properly waiting, all who possessed that gift, might prophesy, and all be edified. Nor could it be urged, that the divine impulse upon their minds constrained them to speak immediately, as the frantic heathen priests and priestesses did: for “the spirits of the prophets,” (their minds when most powerfully influenced by the Holy Spirit,) were subject to government, and might be restrained, directed, and regulated, by reason and judgment, as at other times. That gracious God, whose Spirit spake by them, was by no means “the Author of confusion” and disorder, such as must ensue from the vehement utterance of many speakers at once, emulously seeking to attract most attention: but of peace, harmony, mutual love, and good order; as it was evident in the conduct of “all the churches of the saints,” in this and other particulars. (Marg. Ref. h—k.)—If there, &c. (28) It might happen that some person should speak in a tongue, not understood by the assembly: and, though able to interpret it into his own native tongue; neither he nor any present, could render what he had spoken into the language of the auditory; as distinct from both the language in which he spake, and from his native language.

34 Let your women keep silence in the churches: for it is not permitted unto them to speak; but <sup>o</sup> they are commanded to be under obedience, <sup>p</sup> as also saith the law.

35 And if they will learn any thing, <sup>q</sup> let them ask their husbands at home: for it is <sup>r</sup> a shame for women to speak in the church.

Note.—(Note, 11:2—16.) To reconcile these verses with the scripture referred to, it seems most natural to suppose, that some of the Corinthian women were used to speak publicly, when not under any immediate or extraordinary impulse of the Holy Spirit; and perhaps they interrupted the other speakers, by inquiries or objections, according to the disputatious spirit which prevailed. The apostle therefore laid it down as a general rule, (to which the foregoing case was the only exception,) that women must not be allowed to speak in the public congregation, or to assume the office of teachers, or disputants: for this by no means consisted with that subjection to their husbands, which the law of God inculcated. But if they met with any thing in the public instructions, which they could not understand or assent to; let them wait till they went home, and then ask their husbands about it; who were supposed able and willing to inform them, and who were the most proper persons for them to confer with. (Notes, Gen. 3:16. 1 Tim. 2:11—14.) For it was inconsistent with modesty and pro-

38 But if any man be ignorant, let him be ignorant.

39 Wherefore, brethren, covet to prophesy, and forbid not to speak with tongues.

40 Let all things be done decently and in order.

Note.—The abuses, here reprov'd, were peculiar to the church at Corinth; yet they counted themselves a model for other churches to imitate. Was then theirs the mother-church, from whom the preachers of the gospel had first come forth? or had the word of God reached them alone? (Marg. Ref. s.—Notes, Is. 2:2—5. Rom. 15:18—21. 1 Thes. 1:5—8.) As it was evident, that neither of these was the case; and as many churches had been planted before the church at Corinth; why did they presume to set themselves up above, or against, the wholesome regulations observed elsewhere? Indeed, some one at least of their ambitious teachers might be strenuous in supporting the innovations, which had been introduced; professing that he was "a prophet, or a spiritual man," "that is, one well qualified, by religious instruction, to understand and judge about 'spiritual things; as opposed to "the carnal man," and "the babe in Christ." Beza. If he really were so, let him show it, by acknowledging the things, thus communicated, to be the commandments of Christ by his apostle. But if any man was, or professed to be, ignorant of his apostolical authority, and of the obligation of these instructions; let him continue ignorant, for it would answer no purpose to enter into any further debate with him. (Marg. Ref. t.—x.—Notes, Matt. 7:6. 15:12—14. 2 Thes. 3:14,15. 1 Tim. 6:1—5.)—Upon the whole, therefore, the apostle exhorted them to "covet to prophesy;" in preference to all other spiritual gifts, yet not to forbid speaking with tongues: but let all things, relative to their public assemblies, be regulated with a strict regard to decorum, propriety, and regularity: as this must tend very much to their own edification, and the credit of the gospel among unbelievers; as well as be most honorable and acceptable to God. (Marg. Ref. y, z.)—To adduce this text, as a direct argument about any particular external ceremonies, used in divine worship, (which always appear decent and orderly to those who invent, impose, or are attached to them, and the contrary to those who dissent from them,) is doubtless wresting it from its proper meaning. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.

All our pursuits should spring from "love," as the grand motive; and this we ought to follow after, without wearying, though it seem continually to flee from us.—Every endowment or possession is valuable in proportion as it is useful; and all public ordinances should be conducted in that manner, which most conduces to the edification, exhortation, animation to duty, and consolation under afflictions, of believers; and to the conversion of sinners. Even fervent spiritual affections must be governed by the sober exercise of the understanding: or else, with the best intentions, men will run into great extravagances, and disgrace the truth which they mean to promote.—What shall I profit others? or, in what respect shall I be profited? are proper inquiries, when we are considering, in what manner to conduct our assembling together for religious duties, and even our social meetings. Ministers, especially, should not only study to exercise their gifts, with acceptance and reputation; but inquire in the first place, what peculiar advantage their hearers may derive from the subjects which they select, and their manner of explaining and enforcing them. Alas! for want of this, many a good speaker in delivering an eloquent and admired discourse, is even more unmeaning than "things without life giving sound;" and if they, who play on musical instruments, made no more exact distinction in their sounds, than many preachers do in their doctrine, and exhortation; and in suiting their subjects, and their addresses to the cases and characters of their hearers; they would be unfit even to direct the motions of dancers, much more to call the soldier to arm for the battle.

V. 13—25.

While we most reasonably exclaim against prayers and worship, in an unknown tongue; and thank God for emancipating us from so absurd an imposition: we should inquire, whether some, who speak in the language of their native country, do not so affect elegant phrases, sonorous words, or words adopted from other languages, and learned discussions; as to render themselves unintelligible to the common people; and, whether this be not quite as irrational, as preaching to Britons in Greek or Latin would be. This alas! is sometimes, in a measure, the case with preachers, whose doctrine is worthy of attention; for obscurity is the best qualification of many public teachers! If we use language in any respect above the capacities of our most illiterate and weakest hearers, to please a few who are more learned and polite; how shall they, who most need instruction, know what is spoken? Indeed, it might as well be spoken to the air. But if we speak in plain, simple, and perspicuous language, which even children may understand, (and this does not imply coarseness and vulgarity;) we may be sure, that the more intelligent part of our audience will be edified, if disposed to receive instruction. And surely, a minister of Christ should more desire to "excel, for the edifying of the church;" than in order to obtain the character of a polite, correct, eloquent, or learned speaker! Whatever judgment others may form; all, who are actuated by the love and zeal of the apostle, will choose to speak "five words so as to be understood, rather than ten thousand words in an unknown tongue;" and will waive the display of the natural or acquired abilities, when possessed from the same motive, as the apostle did his gift of divers tongues. (Notes, 2:1—5.)—Whether we pour out our prayers, sing the praises of God, or thank him for his mercies; we should be careful to unite spiritual affections with sober judgment: and they, who lead in social worship, should use such language, as may affect and instruct the meanest fellow-worshipper, and enable him to add his cordial "Amen" to what is spoken.—We should indeed be as children in respect of malice and revenge; and a child-like docility, simplicity, dependence, and submission greatly become us: but childish deviations from the dictates of good sense and sober reason, are unbecoming the disciples of Christ; who should endeavor to attain a ripeness in wisdom and understanding, and to "walk wisely towards them that are without." (Notes, Matt. 10:16—18, v. 16. Eph. 5:15—20. Col. 4:5,6.) Though the conducting of public worship ought to be peculiarly directed to the edification of believers, and of the congregation: yet provision should also be made for those unbelievers, or curious strangers, who may come among us even as spies to make remarks; nor should any thing be admitted which may reasonably excite their disgust, or needlessly confirm their prejudices. They are ready enough to conclude, that we are enthusiastic, or "mad," without our giving them any ground for the charge: and the more willing we are to bear contempt and reproach, when unmerited, the more careful should we be not to deserve them. This has not been in any measure sufficiently attended to; and many things have been said and done, without warrant from scripture, nay, contrary to its plain import, and the gravity and discretion which it inculcates; and this even by good men, who have sent away occasional hearers riveted in their prejudices against the truth, and disposed to ridicule it in every company: so that the mischief thus done, is incalculable. But when the word of God is soberly spoken, with an address both to the understanding and the affections, and with an authoritative application to the conscience, occasional hearers are often unexpectedly impressed; being judged, convinced, and arraigned by what they hear. The very "secrets of their hearts" seem to be disclosed by the experimental address of the preacher; and they are induced to join in that worship, which they before despised; and to confess that "God is of a truth among" those persons, whom perhaps they came prepared to deride. (Note, Tit. 2: 7,8.)

V. 26—40.

In all things edification should be aimed at: ambition, emulation, and self-preference should be steadily repressed: men should be "swift to hear and slow to speak;" more ready to receive, than forward to give instruction; and willing, (unless the case require the contrary,) to "speak to themselves and to God," leaving others to edify the congregation to better advantage. When professors of evangelical doctrine, who imagine themselves qualified and called to be teachers, are so full of their subject, that they cannot refrain from speaking, however unadvised or irregular their conduct may be; it is evident that they are more influenced by self-sufficiency and ambition, or by enthusiastic impressions, than by humble zeal and love. For the Spirit of God moves the will and affections, in a manner consistent with the exercise of sober reason and discretion. "Even the spirits of the prophets were subject to the prophets;" and doubtless this must be, at least equally, the case with inferior teachers. For "God is the Author of peace and good order, not of confusion:" and he never teaches men to neglect their relative duties, to act in a manner, which is unbecoming their age and station, or inconsistent with decency and propriety. Indeed, restrictions of this kind are not regarded by many, who think themselves immediately influenced by the Spirit of God, and more spiritual and zealous than their brethren: yet it behoves them to show, that they are so, by acknowledging these regulations of the apostle to be the commandments of Christ, and excellently suited to render the worship and conduct of his people respectable before men, and honorable to him. Whereas, deviations from them often lead to those things which are indeed shameful; and suited to prejudice men's minds against the gospel: as if it dissolved relative obligations, put an end to all regular subordination; and taught even women to act inconsistently with that modesty, which is their peculiar ornament and honor. But if men will remain ignorant of such things, after proper instruction and warning, it is not advisable to be always debating with them: we must leave them, "take heed to ourselves," and seek other opportunities of usefulness.—However valuable miraculous gifts were in the primitive church; we cannot well read this epistle without cheerfully acquiescing in the will of God, as to his withholding them from us. Man's heart is so prone to pride, ostentation, and folly; that even endowments, of this kind, were made occasions of grievous sins and offences! Our vain-glory is sufficiently excited by inferior and ordinary gifts or abilities; and this often militates greatly against our usefulness and peace; and requires many painful and distressing remedies, to prevent its more fatal effects. (Notes, and P. O. 2 Cor. 12:1—10.) Let us then be contented with our present means and methods of instruction; let us endeavor to "do all things decorously and in order;" and above all desire that grace which sanctifies and humbles the soul, and so prepares it for heavenly felicity.

CHAP. XV.

The apostle states that gospel, which he had preached at Corinth, and shows how fully the resurrection of Christ had been demonstrated. 1.—11. He proves, that the resurrection of the dead is inseparable from that of Christ; and that the denial of it is subversive of Christianity, and of all the hopes of Christians: 12—19; but "Christ, the First-fruits," having risen, all others shall arise in due order; till death the last enemy being subdued, the kingdom shall be delivered up to the Father, 20—23, otherwise it would be vain for any to rise: their lives, as the apostle did, 29—32. He warns and reproves the Corinthians, refutes objections, and illustrates his doctrine, 33—41; shows some things relating to the general resurrection; contrasts the first and the second Adam, and shows the change which will be wrought both in the dead, and those who shall at that time be found living, 42—53. As death will at length be thus swallowed up in victory; he triumphs in hope over death and the grave, through Christ, 54—57; and concludes with an animated exhortation, to steady and persevering diligence, in the work of the Lord, 58.

MOREOVER, brethren, <sup>a</sup> I declare unto you the gospel which I preached unto you, <sup>b</sup> which also ye have received, and wherein <sup>c</sup> ye stand;

The apostle here entered on another subject. The Corinthians were tinged with the Sadducean spirit of Jewish skeptics; or rather with the philosophizing temper of the Grecians, who derided the doctrine, and denied the possibility, of a resurrection: some of them also maintaining that virtue was its own reward, and that the expectation of a future recompense was a mean unworthy motive. So that, certain persons at Corinth began to teach, that there would be no resurrection; allegorizing, or explaining away, what had been revealed, or declared, to them on that subject. (Note, 2 Tim. 2:14—18.) It does not however appear that they denied the immortality of the soul.—In order to stop the progress of so pernicious an error, the apostle began, by stating the substance of the doctrine which he had taught them; which they had received by faith, as a divine testimony, in which he supposed them still to be steadfast; and by which they "were saved," and would certainly be finally saved, in case they remembered and cleaved to what he had delivered to them: this they would do, unless they had believed, with a vain, empty, and inefficient faith, in which case they might be left to embrace tenets subversive of the whole doctrine of Christ. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 12—18. 11:17—22. Matt. 13:20, 21. Jam. 2:19, 20.)

<sup>11</sup> Therefore <sup>b</sup> whether it were I or they, so we preach, and so ye believed.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—In the first place, and as a matter of the greatest importance, the apostle had delivered to the Christians at Corinth, as also to other churches, even as he had received it of the Lord Jesus: (Notes, 11:23—28. Is. 21:10. Acts 20:18—27.) that he, the Messiah, the Son of God, had died, a spotless sacrifice of infinite value, for the sins of mankind, as "the Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world," in order, "that all who believe in him should not perish, but have everlasting life:" and this agreed with the types, prophecies, and promises of the scriptures: (Marg. Ref. g, h.) That, being really dead, Pilate had delivered his body to Joseph of Arimathea, to be buried; and that on the third day he arose again, as it had been foretold. (Marg. Ref. i—l.—Notes, Matt. 12:38—40. Acts 2:25—32.) To demonstrate his resurrection, on which the whole of Christianity rested, he first appeared to Peter; (Note, Luke 24:32—35.) then in the evening of that day, to those of the twelve apostles who were assembled; and on the evening of the succeeding first day of the week, when Thomas was present and confessed him, as "his Lord and God;" (Notes, John 20:19-29.) that afterwards he appeared to above five hundred disciples at once; doubtless in Galilee, where he was most known, where many of his disciples lived, and where he had appointed to meet the apostles. (Marg. Ref. p.—Note, Matt. 28:16,17.) Much the greatest part of these had been still preserved, to be living witnesses of that great event; though "some had fallen asleep," having died in faith and hope, and so departed to be present with their Lord. (Marg. Ref. q.) Afterwards James was favored with a visit from his risen Saviour. Probably, this was James the son of Alphaeus who wrote the epistle; but we have no other account of this appearance of Christ. Then he was seen of all the apostles, before and at his ascension: (Notes, Matt. 28:16-20. Mark 16:14-20. Luke 24:36-53. Acts 1:1-5. 10:36-43.) and last of all he had graciously manifested himself to Paul also, in such a manner, that he could not but assuredly know him to be Jesus, who had been crucified. (Notes, Acts 9:1-30.) In this, the Lord had acted with peculiar condescension and mercy; because he, Paul, was so base and worthless, that he was more properly to be deemed "an untimely birth," or an abortion, than in any way entitled to such distinguished favor. (Marg. Ref. s—u.)—Suetonius says, that there were, in the time of Augustus, an enormous number 'of senators, ... and most of them most unworthy of that dignity, having, after the death of Cæsar, by favor and bribery gotten to be elected. These the multitude proverbially styled abortives. St. Paul, like them, was none of the regular number of the twelve, first taken in, in Christ's life-time, ... no way worthy to be an apostle; ... and yet, by Christ's grace and special favor, called and admitted to this dignity.' Hammond. In this respect he considered himself, as "the least of the apostles," and unworthy to be numbered among them, (though in endowments and authority he was "not a whit behind the chiefest of them,") (Note, 2 Cor. 11:1-6.) because he had, so wickedly and cruelly, persecuted the church of God. (Notes, 1 Tim. 1:12-16.) By the rich mercy and powerful grace of God he was, however, at length brought to be a Christian and an apostle, and to be employed in many, and those most important services. Nor was this distinguishing favor shown him in vain; seeing he had been constrained by the love of Christ and of souls to labor "more abundantly," than any even of the other apostles. Yet this was not to be ascribed to him, or to any thing in his natural disposition more towardly than others; but wholly to "the grace of God that was with him," which both wrought the willing mind, and gave him the ability thus to "abound in the work of the Lord." (Marg. Ref. x—a.—Notes, 2 Cor. 1:12-14, v. 12. Phil. 2:12,13. Col. 1:28,29.) As therefore all the apostles had been witnesses of Christ's resurrection, so both they and he had every where preached the same doctrines. These were then to be considered as the grand peculiarities of Christianity, which could not be denied without virtually attempting to subvert the whole system.—Several other appearances of Christ after his resurrection have been considered as recorded by the evangelists; but this account mentions circumstances not before stated, and illustrates that important subject.

12 ¶ Now <sup>e</sup> if Christ be preached that he rose from the dead, <sup>d</sup> how say some among you that there is no resurrection of the dead?

13 But <sup>e</sup> if there be no resurrection of the dead, then is Christ not risen:

14 And if Christ be not risen, <sup>f</sup> then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain.

15 Yea, and we are found <sup>g</sup> false witnesses of God; because <sup>h</sup> we have testified of God that he raised up Christ: <sup>i</sup> whom he raised not up, if so be that the dead rise not.

16 For if the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised:

17 And if Christ be not raised, <sup>h</sup> your faith is vain; <sup>l</sup> ye are yet in your sins.

18 Then they also which are <sup>m</sup> fallen asleep in Christ, are perished.

Note.—All the apostles preached the resurrection of Christ, as an undoubted fact, a fundamental doctrine, and the great demonstration of the truth of the gospel. How then was it, that some Corinthians ventured to declare, that "no resurrection of the dead" was to be expected? Probably they argued against the possibility or credibility of such an event; and then endeavored to put a figurative construction on the testimony of apostles or prophets concerning it. This however amounted to a denial of Christ's resurrection: for that authenticated fact demonstrated the possibility of the dead being raised; it confirmed all that he had taught about that doctrine; and it was an earnest of the resurrection of all believers: so that, to invalidate the resurrection of Jesus would subvert Christianity itself. (Marg. Ref. c—f.—Notes, 20-28. John 5:28,29. 11:20-27.) For this was the grand proof that he was the Messiah: it attested the acceptance of his atonement; and it made way for his ascension, intercession, and mediatorial kingdom. (Notes, Rom. 4:23-25. 8:32-34.) The whole therefore of the doctrine, taught by the apostles, was so inseparably connected with "the resurrection of Christ; that, if this could be disproved, their preaching would be evinced to be useless and delusory, and the faith of their hearers groundless and unprofitable. Yea, they would be convicted of bearing false witness in this sacred cause, as if God had needed such base frauds to support religion in the world! which in some respects was "bearing false witness against him." (Marg. Ref. g, h.—Note, Job 13:7—12.) And, notwithstanding all the miracles wrought by them, with their self-denying labors, holy lives, and patient sufferings unto death, it would be proved, that they had combined together to deceive mankind with a most egregious falsehood! (Note, 2 Pet. 1:16—18.) For the general proposition, "that there is no resurrection," included in it that particular one, "Christ is not risen:" as the resurrection of others could only need a continuation of that same omnipotent exertion, which raised him from the grave. But if Christ were not risen, "their faith was vain," and "they were yet in their sins:" for no repentance or reformation could possibly take away their guilt; and nothing could prove that Christ's atonement had been accepted, except his resurrection from the dead. Nay further, they who had died in the faith, and fallen asleep in Jesus, whether by a natural death, or as martyrs, had certainly perished in their sins, if Christ was not risen: for, whatever might be urged on other grounds, for the immortality of the soul, there could be no other way of forgiveness, acceptance, and eternal life, than through the efficacy of his atoning sacrifice, the belief of which could not consist with the denial of his resurrection. (Marg. Ref. k—m.)—As the persons spoken of had actually repented, renounced sin, and "walked in newness of life;" they could not "perish in their sins," except through the want of a sacrifice sufficient to expiate their guilt: and thus the apostle's argument, concerning our Lord's resurrection, demonstrates that he, and the primitive church, universally regarded the doctrine of the real Atonement of Christ's death, as essential to Christianity.—If Christ be not risen for our justification, we are yet under the guilt of sin: and if so, both body and soul must 'perish after death; and then the hope of Christians must terminate with this life.' Whitby.

19 If in <sup>a</sup> this life only we have <sup>o</sup> hope in Christ, we are <sup>p</sup> of all men most miserable. [Practical Observations.]

Note.—If the consolations, derived from the hope and earnest of another life, were to be thus torn from Christians, and they had no other benefit from Christ than what related to this present life, they would be "of all men most miserable." Some explain this wholly of the apostles, as exposed to peculiar hardships and sufferings; and as peculiarly guilty in propagating an imposture, if indeed Christ was not risen: but there seems no proof that this restriction was intended. It does not follow, that Christians would in fact be more unhappy than other men, if there should in the event, be no future reward; for even then, their hopes of heaven, and that consolation which is thence derived, would far more than counterbalance their peculiar trials, self-denials, and hardships: but if this hope and consolation were taken from them; they would indeed be more miserable than other men: having lost their relish for those vain pleasures, which alone could be hoped for, and in which other men with a measure of success, strive to forget their misery; experiencing earnest desires, which must certainly be disappointed; and enduring many peculiar evils, without any peculiar support and consolation.—The fact however is, that Christians have not only the hope of a future felicity, but also the earnest, the beginnings, and first-fruits of it, in those holy affections towards God, and that "joy" in him "which a stranger intermeddeth not with;" and therefore they are so far from being "of all men most miserable;" that they of all men enjoy the most solid comfort, amidst their difficulties and trials, and even in the seasons of the sharpest persecutions. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Rom. 5:3—5. 2 Cor. 1:1—7, vv. 3—6. 6:3—10.)—Many of the Corinthians were not aware, what dangerous inferences were fairly deducible from the tenets, to which they had listened; and their false teachers would doubtless disavow them; yet it was proper thus to expose them; that they might be put upon their guard, and not patronize opinions pregnant with such mischief to the souls of men, and so destructive of the animating hopes and comforts of all believers.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The apostle, having established the fact of Christ's resurrection; from that fact shows the certainty of our resurrection; and then, from the important questions in the thirty-fifth verse, he takes occasion to enlarge on the glorious change which shall take place in the bodies of the saints; and finally he triumphs over death by the consideration of a resurrection and a glorious immortality. This is the plan, or method, and the coherence of the parts, in this noble chapter.—In opposition to the errors above noticed, the apostle "testified," with authority, as fully instructed by immediate revelation, that "Christ is risen from the dead, and become the First-fruits of those who slept" in death; even of all believers who had died from the beginning, and of all who should die to the end of the world. (Marg. Ref. r.—Notes, 3—11, 50—54. Dan. 12:2, 3. Matt. 27:51—53. 1 Thes. 4:13—18.) He was the First, who arose to die no more; and the most illustrious of all, who ever shall die and arise. He arose as a public Person, as the Surety, the Representative, and the Fore-runner, of his saints: his resurrection was a pledge and assurance of theirs; and as "the first-fruits," presented to God, to sanctify and secure his blessing upon the whole harvest. (Notes, Lev. 23:10—14. Col. 1:18—20. Jam. 1:16—18.) "For since by man" sin and death entered into the world; so, "by Man," by One in human nature, "came the resurrection of the dead:" and, as in consequence of their relation to Adam, all men are born mortal, and at length die; even so, in and by Christ, shall all be made alive. (Notes, John 11:20—27, vv. 26, 27. Rom. 5:12—19.) All men, without exception, through his undertaking being placed under a dispensation of mercy, shall be raised from the dead, that their future state may be accordingly determined: yet none will be finally benefited, except those, who are one with him by faith, and the participation of his life-giving Spirit; and of these the apostle particularly, and almost exclusively, treats in this chapter. (Note, John 5:23, 29.)—This resurrection was appointed to take place in due order: Christ himself "the First-fruits:" hereafter, at his coming, his redeemed people will be raised before others; and at last the wicked will arise also. Then "the end" of this present state of things will arrive: and, the solemnities of the final judgment being concluded, Christ will deliver up the mediatorial "kingdom of God, even to the Father" from whom he received it; having previously "put down all rule, and all authority, and power," which have been placed in opposition to his cause and kingdom. (Marg. Ref. x—a.) For "he must reign, till all enemies" be subjected to him; as it had been predicted concerning him, and the scripture cannot "be broken." (Marg. Ref. b.—Note, Ps. 110:1.) Of these enemies, "death" will be the last, which will be put under the Redeemer's feet; when he has finally delivered all his people from this universal conqueror, and entirely abolished him. (Marg. Ref. c.—Notes, 2 Tim. 1:10. Heb. 2:14, 15.) For when it is said, that JERUSALEM has put all things under the feet of Christ; it is evidently meant of all creatures, and with an exception of the great Creator, "who put all things under him." Thus, "when all things shall be subdued" to the incarnate Son, and when the end of his mediatorial authority shall be thus completely answered; "then shall the Son himself," as Man and Mediator, be "subject unto Him, who hath put all things under him:" all the power and authority will be acknowledged to have been of God, and all the honor will be referred to him; his absolute kingdom shall then supersede the mediatorial kingdom of Christ; that God may be acknowledged and glorified, as "all in all;" the first great Cause, and the last End, in every thing, and the Object of universal adoration and obedience. (Marg. Ref. d—g.—Note, Phil. 2:9—11.)—The distinction between the absolute, universal, and everlasting kingdom of God, the Governor of all, and the mediatorial kingdom of Christ, as instituted for the benefit of fallen man, is every where implied in scripture. The Father, as the Head of the absolute kingdom, ceased not to reign, when the Son was advanced to the mediatorial throne: as that authority was intended to endure only for a season, in order to accomplish certain important ends, to the glory of God in man's salvation. (Notes, Matt. 28:19. John 5:20—30.) After the day of judgment, this kingdom will be terminated: Christ, having executed his commission, will cease to reign "over all worlds," as Mediator, having publicly "delivered up the kingdom to God" in the person of "the Father:" yet he will in human nature retain a peculiar authority over his redeemed people; and, as One with the Father, he will, with him and the Holy Spirit, reign One "God over all, blessed for evermore:" nor will he any more cease to reign in this sense, when he has given up the mediatorial kingdom, than the Father ceased to reign, when he appointed the Son to that kingdom. For in this passage, as in some others, the Person of the Father is mentioned, as filling the throne and appointing the Mediator; in order to distinguish the absolute authority of God, from the delegated authority of the Son in human nature.—He saith not that "the Father," mentioned in the twenty-fourth verse, but that "God may be all in all:" and so he seems to lead us to that interpretation of the Godhead, which comprehends Father, Son, and Holy Ghost: That the Godhead may govern all things immediately by himself, without the intervention of a Mediator between him and us, to exact our obedience in his name, and to convey to us his favors and rewards. ... So that as now Christ, Theanthropos, God man, is "all in all;" (Col. 3:11.) because the Father

er hath put all things into his hands, does all things, and governs all things, by him; when this economy ceases, the Godhead will be "all in all," as governing and influencing all things by himself immediately. "That God may be all in all," ... by a full communication of himself to, and an intimate union with, all his saints. ... Though it (the kingdom of Christ,) shall have no such end as the preceding monarchies had (Luke 1:32,33.) by giving place to a succeeding kingdom: (Dan. 7:14.) but shall be an eternal kingdom in the same sense, in which "he is a Priest for ever:" ... (Heb. 7:17,24,25.) yet as that priesthood must needs cease, when the subject of it ceaseth, and he hath none to intercede for: so must his kingly office cease, when all his friends have that eternal life conferred upon them, for which this power was committed to him, and all his "enemies are become his footstool." ... Though the Godhead could alone enable him to execute his kingly office; yet was he thus exalted, this power and judgment were conferred on him, "because he was the Son of man." (John 5:27.) He intercedeth still in heaven, by virtue of his blood; all favors are granted to the church through him, and God will judge the world "by the man Christ Jesus." ... While he continued on earth, and acted only as a Prophet sent from God; he always owned that he could "do nothing of himself, but as the Father gave him commandment, so he did, and so he spake." (John 5:30, 8:38, 12:49.)—But being exalted to be Lord of all things, he acted as Lord in all things, which relate to his kingly office over his church. ... The exercise of this authority he shall then lay down, when "all things are subdued to him;" no other kingdom or dominion being to be exercised in the celestial state, but what is essential to the whole Godhead. And though he shall ever so far reign, as to be still at the right hand of God, in honor, dignity, and beatitude; ... and though the effects of his kingly power shall continue for ever, his enemies being destroyed, and his saints reigning in bliss for ever; yet the exercise of that kingly power shall then cease, and he, as Man, shall be subject to the Father. ... As Christ before was "all in all," in reference to his church, and "from his fulness they did all receive;" so now the Godhead may be all in all, and fill all things immediately by himself. Whitby.—No doubt, Christ, as Man, and in his mediatorial kingdom, always was most perfectly subject to the Godhead, referring all to his honor, and exercising all his authority, "to the glory of God the Father:" but when the grand designs of that kingdom shall be illustriously completed, in the view of all holy creatures in the universe, and the kingdom delivered up; this shall appear in the most conspicuous manner, and so as far to exceed all our conceptions: and the glory of the Godhead, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, will be displayed and adored, in the highest possible degree. "The resurrection of all that "are Christ's," is to be at this very advent: but how can he "deliver up his kingdom" and yet reign on earth a thousand years? "In a word, if all that are his must be raised at his coming to the final judgment, then none

'before that coming; and then they must be all raised together, not some a thousand years before the rest.' Whitby. (Note, Rev. 20:4—6.)—He hath put, &c. (27) Both in the LXX. and the Hebrew the verb is in the second person, "Thou hast put, &c." (Ps. 8:6. Notes, Ps. 8:4—9. Heb. 2:5—13.)

29 Else <sup>h</sup> what shall they do which are baptized for the dead, if the dead rise not at all? why are they then baptized for the dead?

30 And <sup>i</sup> why stand we in jeopardy every hour?

Note.—The apostle having shown the order and event of the general resurrection, proceeds to evince still further the importance of a firm belief respecting it.—The expression "baptized for the dead," has given occasion to a variety of ingenious conjectures and learned discussions. Some argue that it only means, 'baptized in the name of one who certainly died,' and who, "if the dead rise not," still remains 'among the dead.' But the word rendered "dead" is plural, and all the labor bestowed to remove that difficulty is to no purpose. Others suppose, that the apostle refers to a practice, which, it seems, at one time prevailed in the church, of baptizing a living person in the stead, and for the supposed benefit, of one who had died unbaptized. But who can imagine, that so absurd and gross a superstition was customary, when the apostle wrote? Or that, if it were, he should sanction it?—Beza, rather triumphantly, concludes that he has discovered and fixed the true interpretation; and that the apostle meant the washing of the dead bodies, among the Jews and Christians, before burial; (Acts 9:37.) which he thinks was a profession that they expected a resurrection. But the use of the word baptize, in such a connexion, could hardly be expected; and the words will not bear that sense, by any fair interpretation.—Hammond contends, that it means the profession of faith, concerning the resurrection of the dead, which was required of persons at their baptism, which represented, as he thinks, the burial and resurrection of Christ. 'Why did they profess this, if they did not believe it?' But this is far from satisfactory: for the peculiar circumstances of some persons, when they were baptized, seem evidently intended.—'What this baptizing for the dead was, I confess I know not; but it seems by the following verses, to be something, wherein they exposed themselves to the danger of death.' Locke.—The following interpretation, however, suggested by Dr. Doddridge, who received it from Sir Richard Ellis, appears the true one. The apostle refers to the case of those, who presented themselves for baptism, immediately after the martyrdom of their brethren, or at their funerals; as if fresh soldiers should enlist and press forward to the assault, to supply the places of those who had fallen in battle. Thus they professed their faith in Christ, and ventured the rage of their enemies, at the very time when others had been put to death for the gospel. But what advantage could they propose to themselves from such a conduct, if there were no resurrection? Or what wisdom could there be in so doing? For in this case, Christianity itself would lose the great evidence of its truth; even the immortality of the soul might be called in question; believers were yet "in their sins;" and they who died as martyrs had lost their souls, as well as their lives. This might show the Corinthian speculators how greatly their notions tended to discourage men from professing the gospel in times of persecution, and to make them afraid and ashamed to own the cause of Christ. If this were the case, why did Christians in general, or the apostles and evangelists in particular, live in continual and imminent danger of suffering and death, by their open profession of the gospel, and their zeal in promoting it? They could have no sufficient encouragement for so doing, if the dead should never arise. (Marg. Ref. i.)

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The apostle protested, in the most solemn manner, "by their rejoicing," or his rejoicing with them, and on their account, as converted by his ministry, (several copies read it "our rejoicing,") that he "died daily;" he was every day exposed to the peril of martyrdom; he expected that violent death continually; and his manifold hardships and sufferings rendered his life a kind of lingering execution. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. k, l.) To all this he had nothing to oppose, except the joyful hope and blessed earnestness of future felicity through his crucified and risen Lord, and the pleasure of bringing others to share the same "salvation with eternal glory;" yet this, upon the principles which he was confuting, must prove a mere delusion. What profit then could he derive from his late perils at Ephesus, "if the dead should not arise?" he had there, "after the manner of men, fought with wild beasts."

It is not in the least probable, that the apostle literally fought with wild beasts in the public shows; such an event could scarcely have been passed over unnoticed by Luke, in "the Acts of the apostles;" being a Roman citizen, it cannot be supposed, that he would be exposed to such an indignity; and the expression "after the manner of men," establishes the figurative interpretation. Indeed the irrational fury of his enraged enemies, with the extreme danger to which he had been exposed, might very properly be represented as a contest with savage beasts of prey.—Many expositors have supposed, that the apostle referred to the tumult at Ephesus, excited by Demetrius and his workmen; (Notes, Acts 19:23—41.) but he afterwards in this epistle, expresses his purpose of continuing at Ephesus till Pentecost; (16:8.) whereas in the history it is said, that "after the uproar ceased, he ... departed to go into Macedonia." (Acts 20:1.) Indeed, his whole plan seems to have been deranged in good measure by that tumult. (Notes, 16:5—9. 2 Cor. 1:15—20.) Had he, in this short and figurative expression, alluded to that event, in writing to the Corinthians; it must have been as supposing them previously acquainted with it. It is evident, that he wrote from Ephesus, and that he intended to remain there for some time longer. The epistle must therefore have been written before that tumult; and some other of his many hardships at Ephesus must be meant. He had great success and many adversaries in that city: and it is plain, that only a small part of his sufferings have been particularly recorded. (Notes, 2 Cor. 11:21—31.)—"If this sense" (the literal interpretation.) "be not liked, you may interpret "after the manner of men," according to the intention of men, it being the intention of the men of Asia to deal so with him. Note also, that "cruel and bloody-minded men are often represented under this metaphor of beasts. So Ignatius, when he was carried from Syria to Rome, under a band of soldiers, who, saith he, are the worse for the kindness I show them, 'From Syria to Rome I fight with beasts.' And Heraclitus ... says, 'The Ephesians were turned into beasts, because they slew one another.'" Whitby.—The apostle's conduct however, in steadfastly persevering to profess and preach the gospel, abundantly demonstrated that he most firmly believed a future resurrection, with which all his hopes and comforts were inseparably connected. Whereas, the epicurean maxim, "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die;" let us indulge every sense and appetite, without restraint, and shrink from all hardship as much as possible, for death will soon terminate our pleasures, and nothing further is to be expected; this would be the natural inference from a denial of that doctrine, when carried to its unavoidable consequences. (Marg. Ref. m—p.)—Let none then be deceived, by the specious reasonings and pretences of their false teachers: for even a heathen poet (Menander,) could teach them, that "evil communications," or the familiar converse of those who inculcated false and pernicious principles, would "corrupt good manners;" and tend to self-indulgence, an undue regard to present ease, interest, or reputation; and a disposition to neglect their duty, conceal their sentiments, and avoid suffering for Christ's sake. Indeed, these principles had already produced these effects in many instances, and were diffusing their baleful influence. The apostle must therefore call upon the Christians at Corinth, to "awake righteously" (in a righteous manner, and as became righteous persons,) from the lethargy into which these delusions had thrown them: (Notes, Rom. 13:11—14. Eph. 5:8—14.) for, while they were elated with an opinion of their superior knowledge, it was evident that some among them had not the humbling, sanctifying, and saving knowledge of God; and the communications of these persons "corrupted the good manners" of the rest. This must be spoken "to their shame," and it behoved them to be humbled for it, and ashamed of it: as far better things might have been expected from them, considering the opportunities which they had enjoyed, and the profession which they had made. (Marg. Ref. r—x.)—It is evident, that the apostle constantly aimed to bring the Corinthians to a more humble opinion of themselves, and gradually to draw them off from their false teachers.—*Let us eat, &c. 35 But some man will say, <sup>v</sup> How are the dead raised up? and <sup>z</sup> with what body do they come?

37 And that which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body that shall be, but bare grain, it may chance of wheat, or of some other grain:

38 But <sup>c</sup> God giveth it a body as it hath pleased him, and to every seed his own body.

Note.—The skeptics, who speculated concerning the resurrection, were ready, as the apostle well knew, to inquire, 'In what manner could the dead be raised, after their bodies had been turned to dust, mixed with other substances, and even become a part of other bodies?' And, if this were possible, 'With what bodies, or what sort of bodies, would they come forth from the graves? With such as they had on earth? or with others of a different form and constitution?' (Marg. Ref. y, z.) Such an inquirer the apostle addressed, as a foolish and ignorant man; who presumed to limit omnipotence, and to deny the possibility of an event, because he could not solve all difficulties about it, and comprehend in what manner it could take place. Whereas, even the ordinary productions of the earth exhibited a process, which might illustrate the subject: for the seed sown in the ground does not vegetate, except it corrupt and die. Some modern infidels have maintained, against the apostle, that the seed does not die in vegetation; because the germen lives, and expands itself, and only the extraneous matter corrupts. But, in fact, the seed, as such, does die: it ceases to be a grain of corn; though a part of it springs, as it were, into new life, by a process which we can no more fully comprehend, than we can the manner of the resurrection. Even "a prophet of their own," Lucretius the Epicurean atheist, says;—"Whatever change transfers a body into a new class of beings, may be justly called the death of the original substance. ... For what is changed from what it was, ... that dies." Creecch. The body sown is not the same which will exist, when it has sprung up and produced the full corn in the ear, but a "bare grain of wheat," barley, or other corn. This, after corrupting in the earth, by the wonderful power of God springs up and produces an increase; and he gives that increase "a body, as it pleaseth him." Yet, whatever else is changed, he always gives "to every seed its own body;" and so preserves a complete distinction between the different kinds of vegetable productions. (Marg. Ref. a. c.—Note, John 12:23—26.) Thus the bodies of believers, after corrupting and turning to dust, will be raised in a new and more glorious form; not in every respect the same as they were, but far superior and more excellent. This will be done in the infinite wisdom, according to the sovereign will, and by the almighty power of God; but after a manner inexplicable to us.—The identity of the particles of matter, as necessary to the resurrection of the same body, is no where mentioned in scripture: and this chapter strongly militates against that opinion. God has many other ways of preserving personal identity. Exactly the same particles do not constitute our bodies, for two hours together, in any part of our lives: yet we are the same persons, both in body and soul, from childhood to old age. There is then no necessity to clog the doctrine with this difficulty, which furnishes infidels with their most specious objections against it.—Many of the philosophers, and afterwards of the heretics, considered the body as the prison and sepulchre of the soul, from which it would at death be delivered. Such men, indeed, could not but dislike the doctrine of the resurrection, and be disposed to argue against it: yet the passage does not refer to objectors of this kind; at least, there is no proof that it does.

39 <sup>d</sup> All flesh is not the same flesh: but there is one kind of flesh of men, another flesh of beasts, another of fishes, and another of birds.

40 There are also celestial bodies, and bodies terrestrial: but the glory of the celestial is one, and the glory of the terrestrial is another.

41 There is <sup>e</sup> one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars: for one star differeth from another star in glory.

43 It is sown <sup>i</sup> in dishonor; it is raised in glory: it is sown <sup>k</sup> in weakness; it is raised <sup>l</sup> in power:

44 It is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body. There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—We are here called to reflect on the variety, as well as the wonderful nature, of the works of God, in order to exalt our thoughts concerning his infinite power and wisdom; and thus to silence all objections arising from the difficulties which seem to stand in the way. “The flesh” of different animals (as well as the form of vegetables,) is differently constituted, produced, and supported: yet we cannot comprehend the manner, in which the Creator has made and preserves this difference; though it is evidently intended to fit them for their several kinds of life, their diverse elements, nutriment, and uses. Cannot he then raise our bodies, suited to the state intended for them, consistently with our personal identity, and in a manner inexplicable to us? The same varied wisdom and power of God has formed “celestial,” as well as “terrestrial bodies;” but the celestial appear far more splendid than the terrestrial: yet, even among the former, there are different degrees of glory; as they are in themselves, or as they appear to us. The sun is far more glorious than the moon; yet the reflected light of the moon far exceeds that of the remote stars; and some of them shine more brightly than others. (Marg. Ref. e.—Note, Gen. 1:14—19.) Thus also will it be in “the resurrection of the dead;” the bodies of the righteous will appear as much more glorious than they now do, as the heavenly luminaries excel a clod of the earth; yet will they shine with different degrees of splendor, like the sun, moon, and stars. (Marg. Ref. f.)—The body, as born of dying Adam’s race, and during its mortal state, and especially as dying, “is sown in corruption;” it tends to corruption, and after death it is speedily wasted and decayed: but at the resurrection it will be “raised in incorruption,” without any seeds of mortality, disease, or decay in its constitution; fitted for a state of perfect health, vigor, and activity, to all eternity. (Marg. Ref. g, h.—Note, 1 Pet. 1:3—5.) Here, during life, at death, and in the grave, the body “is sown in dishonor:” it lives as a condemned criminal; various sufferings and diseases are the forerunners of that execution of a criminal, which takes place at death with much ignominy and disgrace; and the wasting state of a dead corpse is very dishonorable in itself: though the death and burial of Christ have sanctified the grave to all believers, and his resurrection has assured us that the body shall be “raised in glory.” But the triumph over death and the grave will be honorable; the body will be rendered most beautiful and glorious; it will be made fit for that heavenly felicity, and those employments in which angels are associated; and it will resemble the glorified body of the Lord Jesus himself, the “First-born from the dead.” (Notes, 55—58. Luke 20:27—38, vr. 35,36. Phil. 3:20,21.) “It is” also “sown in weakness:” our manifold diseases, and death in which they terminate, are peculiar evidences of human imbecility; and the state of the body in the ground, devoured by worms, and turning to the dust, shows most affectingly how little all men’s power and abilities can do for them. (Notes, Ps. 49:6—15.) But the body of a believer will not only be raised by almighty power; it will also be endued with “power,” vigor, and activity, of which we have no conception; and be rendered capable of such motions, and of producing such effects, as utterly surpass whatever we have heard, seen, or imagined. (Marg. Ref. k, l.) In short, the body is here sown a “natural,” or an animal body: it resembles the bodies of animals, in its wants, appetites, pains, and diseases; and after death it returns to dust as they do: but hereafter it will be raised a “spiritual body,” capable of the spiritual employment, worship, and happiness of heaven; entirely refined from all sensual dross and low desires; needing no more food, rest, sleep, or recreation; no longer capable of desiring or relishing animal pleasures; and no more a clog to the soul, but a helper to it in all holy exercises. (Notes, Matt. 17:1,2. P. O. 1—13. 1 Thes. 4:13—18.) For there is “a natural body” suited to our state on earth, and a “spiritual body” suited to the heavenly state; nor can these be in every respect the same. ‘In this state, we are forced to serve our bodies, and to attend their leisure, and mightily depend upon them in the operations of the mind: in the other, our bodies shall wholly serve our spirits, and minister unto them, and depend on them, and therefore may be styled “spiritual.”’ Whitby.

45 And so it is written, <sup>m</sup> The first man, Adam, was made a living soul; the last Adam was made <sup>n</sup> a quickening Spirit.

49 And as we have borne the image of the earthy, <sup>t</sup> we shall also bear the image of the heavenly.

Note.—In the history of the creation it was written, that “the first man, Adam, was made a living soul:” and his “natural” or animal life had been communicated to all his posterity, but without the spiritual life originally connected with it; so that, ever since the fall of Adam, all his descendants, by natural generation, are “dead in sin;” and the very mind of man had been carnal, as well as his body mortal. But “the last Adam,” the last Surety, or Covenant-head, of any of the human race, “was a quickening Spirit:” the Author and Source of spiritual and eternal life to all his people, by the supply of his Holy Spirit. (Marg. Ref. m, n.—Notes, Gen. 2:7,16,17. 3:6. John 1:4,5. 5:20—27. 11:20—27. Rom. 5:12—19. 8:1,2.) Nor does this life-giving energy relate only to their souls; for he will also “quicken,” or make alive, “their mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in them;” and this is here principally intended. (Note, Rom. 8:10,11.) But the “natural” and carnal state, in both cases, precedes the “spiritual:” all are born in sin, bearing the image of “the first Adam:” some are afterwards “born again;” to bear the image of “the second Adam;” the soul continuing numerically and identically the same, though newly created. (Notes, John 3:3—8.) In like manner, all men first have a natural and mortal body like that of Adam, and at length believers shall have an incorruptible and spiritual body, like that of Christ: yet it will be in one sense “the same body,” equally theirs, though in another sense it will be changed. “The first man” was formed of the dust “of the earth;”

and was “earthy” in his nature and original; (Marg. Ref. p.—Notes, Gen. 3:17—19.) but “the second Man,” to whom all believers are united and conformed, “is the Lord from heaven;” “The Lord of glory;” ΙΕΗΟΥΑΗ, God in human nature. (Marg. Ref. q.) As long as we are conformed to “the earthy” Adam, which, in respect of our bodies, will be till the resurrection, we “are earthy:” our bodies, during life, are gross, animal, and diseased; and after death, they turn to the dust whence they were taken. But when we shall be conformed “to the heavenly” Adam; our bodies will become heavenly, and suited to that spiritual and immortal felicity, to which we shall be admitted. Even the apostle, and all Christians, had borne the image of the earthy Adam; but they were assured by the promise of God, that they should at length “bear the image of the heavenly Adam;” not only in their souls; but in their bodies also, which will be raised very different, in their appearance and capacities, from what they were when on earth. (Marg. Ref. r—t.) Thus all philosophical objections were shown to have their foundation in ignorance of the “scriptures, and of the power of God.” (Note, Matt. 22:23—33.)—The last Adam. (45) “The second Man,” 47.—As if none of the human race had existed, except Adam and Christ. For all men will at length be considered either as in Adam or in Christ: unbelievers as one with fallen Adam, and in him; all believers as in Christ, and one with him. (Note Rom. 5:12—21.)—Was made, &c. (45) From the Sept. which accords to the Hebrew: but “the first man, Adam,” is added by way of explanation. (Gen. 2:7.) brought to pass the saying that is written, <sup>h</sup> Death is swallowed up in victory.

Note.—A similar change to that which will take place at the resurrection of the just, must also be made in the bodies of those who shall be found alive at the day of judgment: for "flesh and blood," the human body in its present form and gross manner of subsistence, and with its present animal wants, propensities, and infirmities, "cannot inherit the kingdom of God," or partake of its pure and refined pleasures: nor can "corruption," or the body as mortal and corruptible, "inherit incorruption." or the holy, incorruptible, and unchangeable felicity of heaven. (Marg. Ref. u, x.) The apostle therefore "showed a mystery," which could not be known except by immediate revelation, or understood except by faith receiving that revelation. (Marg. Ref. y.) Speaking of the whole multitude of believers, to the end of time, as constituting one family, to which he and the Corinthian Christians belonged, he might say, "We shall not all sleep," or die, "but we shall all be changed." Yet he elsewhere speaks of himself, as one of those who should be "raised up by Jesus." (2 Cor. 4:14.) So that there can be no ground for the supposition, which many have formed from his language, that he expected to live till the coming of Christ, which he judged to be very near. The notion also of others, that he alluded to the first resurrection, previous to the millennium, is inconsistent with the language of the passage: for those who have died, or shall die before the millennium, as truly "sleep in Jesus," though they should arise immediately; as they do, who shall remain in the state of the dead till the general resurrection. (Note, Rev. 20:4—6.) The apostle therefore only meant to speak of himself as belonging to that one family, of whom the far greater part would die and be raised again, and all the rest must "be changed." This change will be effected "in a moment," instantaneously, as the eye twinkles; by the almighty power of Christ, when the last trumpet shall sound, as the summons to all men to meet their Judge. (Notes, Matt. 24:29—31. 1 Thes. 4:13—18.) Then the voice of Christ will be heard by all the dead, and they will be raised again to life in their own order; and then the bodies of living believers will be changed from "natural" to "spiritual," from "corruptible to incorruptible," from "mortal to immortal;" even as a man's form is changed by putting on new raiment. (Marg. Ref. z—f. —Notes, John 5:28,29. Rev. 20:11—15.) 'The body, which but a moment before appeared just as ours now do, shall, quick as thought, be changed into the image of that worn by our triumphant Lord; and fitted for all the active services, and the purest sensations and delights, of the celestial state.' Doddridge. (Note, Phil. 3:20,21.) When this change has taken place in respect of all believers, then the saying of the prophet will finally be accomplished. (Marg. Ref. h.—Notes, Is. 25:6—8.) Death and all his power shall be annihilated, and "swallowed up" for ever, in the complete victory obtained over him by Christ and his people; and sin, with all its consequences, shall ever after be wholly confined to the place "prepared for the devil and his angels."—The apostle showed the Corinthians a mystery, by informing them of the event that would take place; yet, in respect to the manner in which it would be effected, it still remained mysterious and incomprehensible. Thus the mysteries of the Trinity, and of the incarnation of "the Lord from heaven," are revealed to us as certainly true; but the manner of them still remains inexplicable. (Notes, Matt. 13:10,11. 1 Tim. 3:16.)—Death, &c. (54) Much nearer to the Hebrew, than to the LXX. (Is. 25:8.)

Note.—With the glorious prospect, before the eyes of his faith and hope, the apostle, in the most beautiful and animated apostrophe, addressed "death and the grave," or the unscen state, as real persons, the universal and most terrible conquerors and oppressors of the human race. He demanded of death, "Where is thy sting?" or destructive dart, or spear, with which he had caused such anguish and terror, and wrought such wide-spread desolations. And of "the grave," what was now become of his victory, by which he seemed to have shut up in his dark dungeon as vanquished foes, all the generations of men that had lived on earth. (Marg. Ref. i—l.) Indeed, the sin of man was "the sting" and destructive weapon of death, which both enabled him to kill the body, and had made that fatal stroke most tremendous: and the holy "law," pronouncing the sentence of condemnation against every transgressor, gave "sin power" to bring death upon mankind, and to embitter its agonies with the dread of future punishment. This was the natural and universal state of man; and all must have thus lived, died, and perished miserably, had not God provided deliverance. (Notes, Rom. 5: 12—14, 20, 21. 7: 7—14, 22—25.) But Christians might now unite in returning thanks to God with joyful hearts, for having "given them the victory" over these dreadful foes, "by Jesus Christ," through his atoning sufferings, and glorious resurrection; and for bringing them by his grace, to faith and hope in him. They might therefore, at present, triumph over the fear of death, in confidence of a glorious resurrection for their bodies, as well as of immediate and eternal happiness for their souls: and they would all, at length, most certainly triumph in the full possession of those blessings, and in a complete victory over these enemies. (Marg. Ref. m—p.—Note, Hos. 13:14.) He therefore exhorted his "beloved brethren," to continue "steadfast" in the profession and faith of the gospel, and in their adherence to the truth and will of God amidst all dangers and temptations: and especially to continue "unmovable" in the belief of the resurrection, notwithstanding the artifices and plausible reasonings of false teachers. At the same time, let them "always" abound in all those good works, which the commandment and honor of their Lord required, from love to his name, his cause, and his people: seeing that they had the fullest assurances, that their "labor in the Lord," arising from such motives as his gospel suggested, and especially from love to the Lord Jesus, and zeal for his honor, would by no means be "in vain," either unrewarded or unsuccessful; but that the whole of it would terminate in his glory, the good of mankind, and their own everlasting advantage. (Note, 12—18.)—Every part of this animated discourse shows, that the resurrection of true believers is exclusively intended: for the things spoken will not be fulfilled, either in respect of the dead, or of those who will be found alive, when Christ shall come to judgment, as to any others but true believers, by whatever name, form, or creed, they are distinguished. #### PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.—V. 1—11.

When the faithful minister sees his beloved people drawn aside to embrace dangerous errors; his chief comfort, under the trial, must arise from being able to appeal to them, that the doctrine which he preached was scriptural, and from a full satisfaction, that they who received it, and stand fast in it, will be certainly saved: and that none of them can perish, if they keep in remembrance the instructions which he gave them; unless they deceived themselves with a vain, a dead, and inefficient faith. In order that we may possess this comfort, we must be careful to deliver the truths of revelation pure, as we have received them; and in that order, proportion, and connexion in which they stand in the scriptures: and he who duly attends to these sacred oracles will know assuredly, that the "death of Christ for our sins," and his "resurrection for our justification," are essential and fundamental doctrines, which must, in all places, and on all occasions, be explicitly and strenuously insisted on. Apostles and prophets concur in bearing testimony to them, even more than to many other important truths: and, blessed be God, the demonstration of our Lord's resurrection is equal to the weight, which is to be supported by that important fact. (Note, 1 Pet. 1:10—12.)—The most eminent Christians are always the most humble: they continually reflect on the aggravated sins of their unconverted state; especially if they were long or greatly set in opposition to the gospel. The more evident it is, that God has pardoned them, the less disposed will they be to excuse themselves. They feel their unworthiness of the distinctions conferred on them; they are disposed "in honor to prefer others to themselves:" and, though they cannot but be conscious of what the Lord has done for and by them; yet, taking their whole conduct and obligations together, they readily conclude, that none surely are so unfruitful and unprofitable as they. In reality, it is a great thing for a man with propriety, humility, and truth, to say, "By the grace of God, I am what I am:" the declaration becomes those alone, who are walking under the influence of holy principles, and live a holy life: and is utterly unsuitable to the character of the negligent or formal professor of evangelical truth. But if we really fear and love the Lord, and walk in his ways, we shall ascribe all the glory to his grace and mercy: if "much have been forgiven" us, we should pray to be enabled to love much: (Note, Luke 7:44—50.) if our conversion have been remarkable, we should earnestly desire, that "the grace bestowed on us may not be in vain:" If we have set out late in life to serve the Lord; we should aim to "redeem the time" which has been lost, by "laboring more abundantly" than our brethren: and, while we charge all our sins and follies upon ourselves, we must remember to ascribe all the good which we do, to "the grace of God that is with us." (Note, 1 Chr. 29:10—19.)

V. 12—19.

With what varied subtle devices doth Satan bring in false doctrines, by men of abilities, learning, or eloquence; in a covert and plausible manner, that the simple may suspect no danger! Heretical teachers often with apparent modesty question whether we have rightly understood the sacred writers, and whether the doctrine which they oppose be contained in them. They inquire, whether a more rational interpretation may not be given to this and the other text; whether the more obvious meaning do not involve absurdity, or even impossibility; whether any but the weak and illiterate can credit such mysteries or absurdities; and whether we had not better adopt a figurative sense, or admit some other reading, or even suppose the sacred writer to be mistaken; than assent to so incomprehensible, and therefore irrational, a doctrine. If indeed they could prove the mysteries, which they oppose, to be contrary to fact, to intuition, or to demonstration, their principles might be admitted: but when they apply them to doctrines, which are merely above reason, and contrary to their supposed probabilities, and vain reasonings; they are perfectly inadmissible and irrational; unless man be wiser than his Maker. The dupes, however, of such specious pretences are seldom aware, whither these rational improvements of the creed and of the scriptures tend: they do not perceive, that, according to them, man's presumptuous reason sits in judgment on the infinite wisdom of God; man's weakness is made the standard of omnipotence; and man's conjecture, the measure of divine revelation. Indeed, this is perfectly consistent with those economical and political sentiments, contended for by some of these oracles of an enlightened age; by which children are set to judge, whether their parents are fit to be honored and obeyed, or not; servants are called on to determine the same concerning their masters, and subjects concerning their rulers; and, in short, not only is all subordination virtually destroyed, but, in every relation, the inferior is constituted the judge of his superior, without any appeal from his arrogant tribunal.—In like manner, the principles before cited, when fairly examined, are found to involve consequences, subversive of those truths, which are professedly venerated; to invalidate the testimony of scripture, and tend to universal skepticism: they prove, (if they prove any thing,) that the preaching of the apostles, and the faith of primitive believers, “were vain;” and that the martyrs for the gospel were “false witnesses against God,” by testifying truths and facts, which remote posterity has found out to be false, or needless. This is especially the case, in respect of those doctrines, which relate to the Person, undertaking, and atonement of Christ; and the way of acceptance by faith in him. If “Christ had not risen,” his sacrifice could not have been depended on, because there could be no proof that it was accepted; and consequently even true believers must still be “in their sins:” those who “died in this faith must have perished;” the preachers of the gospel must either have been deceivers or deceived; and the disciples, having only “hope in Christ,” as to this present world, must have been “of all men most miserable.” To what then must the tenets of those lead, who indeed profess to believe that Christ is risen; yet deny, explain away, or overlook those great doctrines, which he especially rose again to establish and demonstrate?

V. 20—23.

Blessed be God, we have the most complete and satisfactory proof, that Christ both “died for our sins,” and rose again for our justification,” and as “the First-fruits” of our resurrection; that, as death entered by man, so might life eternal be introduced by One in our nature. We certainly know, that “in Adam all die;” and we are expressly informed by “the sure testimony of God,” that as in Christ all the human race shall arise, so all who are in him shall arise to immortal glory. Undoubtedly, the suffering, dying, risen, and ascended Saviour will soon appear, to raise the dead and judge the world: may we be then found among “those, that are Christ’s at his coming!” It should be with us a matter of serious inquiry, whether we are his true disciples or not: for soon “the end will come;” the mediatorial “kingdom will be delivered up to God, even the Father;” and all who shall then be found enemies, will be put under the feet of Christ, and be punished with everlasting destruction. Would we then triumph in that most solemn and infinitely important crisis, we must now submit to his rule, accept of his salvation, and live to the glory of God through him. Then shall we at length rejoice in all his victories, and participate his glories: we shall exult with immense satisfaction, in the blessed accomplishment of the Redeemer’s undertaking; and as being with him, our Head in human nature, put under the absolute dominion of our reconciled Father, “that God may be all in all;” that he may receive the whole glory of our salvation; and that we may for ever serve him, and enjoy his favor, without sin or death; and without needing repentance, forgiveness, a sacrifice, or a Mediator, any more to all eternity.

V. 29—34.

Should we lose sight of the animating prospect in the preceding verses set before us; should any one prevail in attempting to argue us out of these our expectations; how must our zeal, diligence, and boldness be enervated, and our rejoicing damped! Who then would step forward to succeed those illustrious soldiers of Christ, that have nobly bled in the cause of truth? Who would confess him in this evil world? Why should we stand amidst dangers and alarms continually? Why should we venture the rage of men, more venomous than serpents, and more subtle than foxes, and more savage than tigers or lions? Such principles would soon induce us to depart from our constancy, and make us exclaim, “What advantage hath it us, if the dead rise not?” or even tempt us to say, “Let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we die.” Let us not then suffer ourselves to be deceived by corrupt reasoners; but let us separate from them, and venture our all for eternity, on the single testimony of “God, who cannot lie.” Let us fear associating with skeptical, profligate, or ungodly men; for “evil communications corrupt good manners:” let us warn our children, our juniors, our hearers, to shun them as a pestilence: let us “awake to righteousness, and sin not;” let us not hearken to those, who know not God, in whatever science else they may excel; being assured that this ignorance will be found shameful, in proportion to the abilities, opportunities, confidence, or profession, of those in whom it is found.

V. 35—44.

If any are still disposed to start objections, or make presumptuous inquiries, when truth are scripturally proposed; let them remember the appellation, which the apostle, or rather the Holy Spirit, gives to such "wise men of this world." For they may thence learn, that man's wisdom consists in becoming "a little child," and simply believing his Maker. The works of creation and providence read us daily lectures of humility; as well as teach us to admire the variety of the great Creator's wisdom and goodness. Till we can fully comprehend the whole process, by which a bare grain, corrupting in the earth, produces many ears of corn at the harvest; and till we can satisfactorily answer all questions, and solve all difficulties about it; let us learn to be the pupils, and not assume to be the counsellors of the most High: and let us hold fast the sure hope of a glorious resurrection, without perplexing ourselves about the manner, in which infinite wisdom and almighty power can effect it.

They, who "shall be accounted worthy" to obtain felicity in the heavenly state, will excel in glory all present splendors, far more than the celestial bodies transcend the terrestrial: and yet they shall exceed one another in glory, as "one star differeth from another;" while Christ, "the Sun of Righteousness," shall infinitely outshine them all. This degraded, corruptible, sinful, and dying body, shall be raised "incorruptible, immortal, and glorious:" it shall become vigorous, active, and beautiful, beyond conception: this animal body shall be raised spiritual. Here our very souls are carnal: there our very bodies will be spiritual. And our "second Adam, the Lord from heaven," will give new and immortal life, as "a quickening Spirit," both to our souls and bodies; that in both, according to our measure, we may bear his image and glorify his name.—As "flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God;" let us not "sow to the flesh, of which we can only reap corruption;" (Note, Gal. 6:6—10.) and, as those who shall be exempted from death must be changed, let this reconcile our minds to that change, which death will begin and the resurrection complete in our bodies, when "death shall be swallowed up in victory." Let us seek the full assurance of faith and hope, that in the midst of pain, and in the prospect of dissolution, we may triumphantly exclaim, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?" that we may hail the sharpest pangs of dying; and think without emotion on the darkness, the corruption, and the imaginary horrors of the tomb: assured that there our bodies will sleep at ease; that in the mean time our souls will be present with our beloved Redeemer; and that our bodies will shortly arise, to share that unspeakable felicity.—But "sin is the sting of death," and who can disarm that "king of terrors?" For "the law is the strength of sin;" and who can answer its demands, endure its curse, or expiate his own transgressions? Hence the terror and the anguish: hence the wretched cleave to life, save when infidelity, despair, and rebellion induce madness and suicide. Hence, death is justly terrible to the unbelieving and impenitent: hence, the needless alarms of the weak and trembling believer. "Thanks be to God," that there is deliverance, and victory, for us in Christ Jesus! (Note, Rom. 7:22—25.) May he give us faith and hope, and increase our faith and hope; that we may not only be safe, but joyful and triumphant! And, having these assurances, let "us be steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord; as knowing that our labor is not in vain in the Lord." (Note, 1 John 3:1—3.)

CHAP. XVI.

The apostle directs the Corinthians, in what way to make collections for the Christians at Jerusalem, 1—4; states his intentions about visiting them, 5—9; commends Timothy, who was coming to them, 10, 11; shows that Apollos declined visiting them at present, 12; exhorts them to vigilance, steadfastness, and love, 13, 14; recommends the household of Stephanos to their special regard, 15, 16; expresses his satisfaction at the coming of certain persons from Corinth, 17, 18; and, after salutations from the churches, concludes in the most awful, yet affectionate manner, 19—24.

2 Upon <sup>d</sup> the first day of the week let every one of you lay by him in store, <sup>e</sup> as God hath prospered him, <sup>f</sup> that there be no gatherings when I come.

Note.—It is evident, that the Corinthians had been previously made acquainted with the apostle's intention, of raising a contribution from the Gentile churches, for the poor Christians in Judea: and, as they were more wealthy than most of their brethren, he did not intimate even a doubt of their liberality in that good work. But he judged it proper, to point out to them the method, about which he had given orders in the churches of Galatia, whence he had lately come. (Marg. Ref. a—c.—Notes, Acts 18:18—23. 24:10—21. Rom. 15:22—29. 2 Cor. 8:9.) "On the first day of the week," let every man treasure up a proportion of his gains, according as God had prospered him during the preceding week: for thus a larger sum would gradually be provided, than could at once have been collected. (Marg. Ref. d—f.)—Some are of opinion, that the sums, thus set apart, were brought to the treasury of the church at the time: but the words do not seem to admit of that interpretation; and if each separately laid by the sum which he purposed to give, the whole would be brought together at once, when necessary, without any trouble in soliciting contributions.—"Laying it up as 'a treasure:'" For these are the true riches, "laid up in heaven, entrusted to God, to be compensated with the amplest interest, both in this 'world and the next; though not of their own 'value, but of his mere liberality.' Beza.—Worldly men, at certain times, augment the treasure which they have before laid up, by adding their clear gains to it: let Christians then imitate them, by laying up on the Lord's day, for their poor and distressed brethren, according "as God had prospered them;" and let them count this their treasure. If this was kept apart by each person, till wanted, so that none knew what others gave; ostentation and corrupt emulation would be far more effectually

excluded, than if each brought his contribution to the common stock every week, and so a public account was taken of it. It was especially needful, that this precaution should be taken at Corinth, where ostentation and emulation greatly prevailed: and it is evident, that the apostle intended, as much as possible, to leave every one, in this respect, to determine for himself before God, what he ought to do; that none might give more than he could properly spare, or than he was from proper motives inclined to, either to acquire applause, or to escape censure and contempt.—The argument from this passage for the observance of the first day of the week, as “the Lord’s day,” the Christian sabbath, is very conclusive: for, unless that were the custom in apostolical churches, why should “the first day of the week” be mentioned in this connexion? ‘On Sunday, says Justin Martyr, all Christians, in the city or country, meet together, because that is the day of our Lord’s resurrection: and then we read the writings of the prophets and apostles. This being done, the president makes an oration to the assembly, exhorting them to imitate and do the things which they have heard; then we all join in prayer, and after that we celebrate the sacrament.’ Whitby. Note.—Every thing having been previously arranged, the apostle, when he arrived at Corinth, would send with the bounty of the Corinthians such persons as they approved and would recommend by their letters. Or joining the words, “by letters,” with the latter clause, whomsoever they approved, the apostle would send, with letters from himself to the apostles and elders at Jerusalem: but if it was thought more satisfactory to all concerned, he himself would accompany the messengers. 5 Now I will come unto you, k when I shall pass through Macedonia: for I do pass through Macedonia.

6 And it may be that I will abide, yea, l and winter with you, m that ye may bring me on my journey whithersoever I go.

7 For I will not see you now by the way; but I trust to tarry a while with you n if the Lord permit.

8 But I will tarry o at Ephesus until p Pentecost.

9 For q a great r door and effectual is opened unto me, s and there are many adversaries.

Note.—The apostle was meditating to make a progress through Macedonia, when he wrote this epistle: and he seems to have given some intimations, that he would go to Corinth in his way to Macedonia, as well as on his return, though it is not here mentioned. (Note, 2 Cor. 1:15, 16.) He had, however, formed his determination of coming; and he assured his brethren at Corinth, that he would make some stay among them, “if the Lord would give him leave:” for he did not think it sufficient, merely to call on them, as a traveller in his journey, when so many things and of so great importance required his presence among them. (Marg. Ref. k—n.) It was, therefore, his design to continue at Ephesus till the feast of Pentecost: the rest of the summer he meant to employ in his progress through Macedonia; and then perhaps to spend the winter at Corinth; expecting that the Corinthians would afterwards help him forward in his journey, “whithersoever he should go.” Perhaps he intended to sail from Ephesus to Corinth first; then after a short stay to go into Macedonia, and afterwards return to winter there. But he thought it incumbent on him to stay some time longer at Ephesus; as great opportunities of service were afforded him; great success attended his labors; and “many adversaries” were excited to oppose him, to terrify or dissuade men from embracing the gospel, or to discourage and mislead the new converts. His presence therefore was peculiarly necessary; though his dangers and hardships were proportionably increased. (Marg. Ref. o—s.—Note, 15:31—34.)—It is evident, from the concluding salutation, that the apostle wrote this epistle from Ephesus, though the spurious addition at the close dates it from Philippi. It is probable, that the tumult made at Ephesus by Demetrius, hastened the apostle’s departure; (Notes, Acts 19:21—41.) and his plan seems in other respects to have been circumstantially deranged. he worketh the work of the Lord, as I also do.

11 Let <sup>v</sup> no man therefore despise him: <sup>z</sup> but conduct him forth in peace, that he may come unto me; for I look for him with the brethren.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—Timothy had been sent before the apostle into Macedonia, with directions to visit Corinth: (Notes, 4:14—17. Acts 19:21,22.) but such was the disposition of many in that city, that it was necessary to charge them not to behave improperly to him when he came. For the apostle was apprehensive, that their party-quarrels, and opposition to his authority, would induce them to show so marked a dislike to Timothy, and even contempt of him, as to make him afraid of executing his commission among them. The apostle therefore assured the Christians at Corinth, that Timothy was faithful and skilful, in “the work of the Lord,” even as he was: let none of them therefore despise him because of his youth, or his supposed deficiency in “the wisdom of words and excellency of speech:” let them encourage and countenance him, in bearing testimony against the evils which had taken place among them: let them not take offence at his faithfulness, or permit him to go away, as one who had incurred their displeasure: but let them conduct him forth, in peace and love, on his journey towards Ephesus, where the apostle expected him with the brethren who accompanied him; for both he and the brethren at Ephesus expected him, as one whom they greatly loved. (Marg. Ref. x—z.—Notes, Luke 10:16. Phil. 2:19—23. 1 Thes. 4:6—8. 1 Tim. 4:11—16. Tit. 2:15.)—Probably Timothy returned to Ephesus, before Paul was driven thence.—“We infer that Timothy was not sent with the epistle: for had he been the bearer of the letter, would St. Paul in that letter have said, “If Timothy come?”... If he was with the apostle, when he wrote the letter, could he say, ... “I look for him with the brethren?”... Timothy was sent forth upon his journey before the letter was written; but he might not reach Corinth, till after the letter arrived there. Acts 19: 21: Paley.—With the brethren. (11) Either those who had accompanied Timothy into Macedonia, or some whom the apostle expected from Corinth.

12 As touching <sup>a</sup> our brother Apollos, I greatly desired him to come unto you with the brethren: but his will was not at all to come at this time; but he will come <sup>b</sup> when he shall have convenient time.

Note.—It seems, that a party at Corinth professed themselves attached to Apollos, in order to cover their opposition to the apostle: (Notes, 1:10—16. Acts 18:24—28.) yet St. Paul greatly desired and exhorted that eminent minister to go among them, with Timothy and Erastus, or with Stephanas and his friends, when they returned to Corinth; (Notes, 15—18. Acts 19:21,22.) being of opinion that his presence would help to allay their disputes, having the most entire confidence in his wisdom and humility. But perhaps Apollos feared lest his presence should have a contrary effect; or he might be fully employed in another place; or perhaps he thought it right to express his decided disapprobation of the conduct of the Corinthians, by absenting himself till they came to a better temper. However, he was not at all willing to go to Corinth at that time; though he intended to visit them when he could with more convenience and propriety. (Marg. Ref.)

Note.—The apostle, about to conclude his epistle, called on his brethren and beloved children at Corinth, instead of presuming on their gifts and privileges, to stand upon their guard against temptations, and be vigilant in avoiding the snares of the great deceiver and his servants. He exhorted them to “stand fast in the faith,” as they were in great danger, and already began to waver: he reminded them to be valiant and prudent, as it became men, in their conflict with their common enemies; and not to behave like children in disputing with one another, and “envying one another:” he directed them to be “strong in the grace of Christ” for their work and warfare, instead of amusing themselves with curious speculations: (Marg. Ref. c—f:—) and, above all, he warned them to manage all their concerns according to the dictates of that love, which he had so fully explained, and so pathetically recommended to them. (*Marg. Note.—(Note, 1:10—16.) Stephanas seems to have been with the apostle at Ephesus, when he wrote this; but his household or family remained at Corinth. The several persons belonging to his family were qualified for usefulness, and ought to have possessed great influence in that church; as they were the oldest converts to Christianity in all Achaia; (Note, Rom. 16:5.) and as they had habitually devoted themselves to every service, by which they could minister to the good of their brethren. (Marg. Ref. i, k.) The apostle therefore besought the Christians at Corinth, to “submit themselves” to the counsel, influence, or ministry of this family; and of others, who concurred with him and them, in endeavors to promote the peace and purity of the church, or labored diligently in that good cause. (Marg. Ref. l—n.)—The coming of Stephanas and his companions (who had probably brought an epistle to him from some of the church at Corinth,) had given him pleasure, because they had further explained all things, concerning the state of the church; and their representation of the proper disposition of many of them, together with their pious conversation, had “refreshed his spirit,” as their company doubtless had frequently refreshed their brethren at Corinth: he therefore admonished them to acknowledge such persons as those, for the servants of Christ, and examples for them to follow, in preference to those teachers, who undermined or opposed his apostolical authority. (Marg. Ref. q, r.—Note, 3 John 9—12.)—Fortunatus is mentioned by Clemens Romanus long after, as the bearer of his epistle from Rome to the church at Corinth: but it is not certain or even probable that the same person was intended.

Note.—(Marg. Ref.—Notes, Rom. 16:5—16,21—33.)—Aquila and Priscilla were at Ephesus, when this epistle was written; but they had returned to Rome, before the apostle wrote to the Christians in that city. (Note, Rom. 16:3,4.)

24 My <sup>d</sup> love be with you all in Christ Jesus. <sup>e</sup> Amen.

Note.—An amanuensis had written the rest of the epistle: but the apostle thought proper to add what follows with his own hand; and to unite a most solemn and awful warning with his affectionate salutations, that it might make the deeper impression. Whatever gifts, knowledge, eloquence, or eminence any man possessed; or in whatever imaginable way he might be distinguished; yet if “he did not love the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema Maranatha.” If he had not a cordial love to the person, salvation, precepts, cause, glory, and people of Christ, he was and would be “accursed,” until and when the Lord should come; though he did not appear as an open enemy to him and his cause. If his conduct proved that he did not love the Lord Jesus, let him be separated from the church, as “an accursed thing” devoted to destruction: and in case he did not afterwards repent, and believe with that “faith which worketh by love;” Christ himself would execute this awful sentence, when he came to judge the world. But if it could not be proved, or was not at all suspected by men, yet it was known to the Lord; and he who had not genuine love to the Saviour, certainly abode under the wrath of God, and would at last sink into utter destruction, as a sacrifice to his justice. For he who does not love the divine Redeemer, must be an enemy to the holy perfections and righteous government of God, an unhumiliated impenitent sinner, and an unbeliever, under the covenant of works and the curse of the law: he must be destitute of all true holiness, incapable of spiritually performing any good work, and unfit for the employment and pleasures of heaven: whoever does not “love the Lord Jesus,” whether an open unbeliever, or a professed Christian, or an apostate, must certainly be numbered, at the day of judgment, among the enemies of God, and have his portion with them. Syriac, and signifies, The Lord cometh. Some Jewish usages are supposed to be referred to; but the above is the undoubted meaning of the passage. "When the Jews lost the power of life and death; they used nevertheless to pronounce an anathema on persons, who according to the Mosaic law, should have been executed; and such a person became an anathema; ... and to express their faith, that God would 'in one way or other interpose to add that efficacy to his own sentence, which they could not give it, it is very probable that they might use 'the word Maran-atha, that is, in Syriac, 'The Lord cometh;' and he will put the sentence in 'execution.' Doddridge.—The apostle, however, did not write this awful warning (for which he saw too much occasion in the conduct of the Corinthian teachers,) from resentment or harshness of spirit; he therefore expressed his earnest desire that the grace and favor of the Lord Jesus might be with them, and rest on them; and he concluded by such an assurance of his cordial love to them all, in Christ and for his sake, as is not found in any other epistle. To this he annexed his Amen, as assuring them of his sincerity in it; notwithstanding the rebukes which he had given them, and the improper treatment which he had received from them. (*Marg. #### PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

It is incumbent on ministers to exhort their people to liberal charity, especially towards their brethren in Christ; and to direct them in the best way of collecting and applying their contributions: and all Christians ought to be "ready for every good work," in proportion "as the Lord prospers" them in their secular concerns.—When a little is weekly appropriated to such purposes, it is parted with more conveniently and less reluctantly, than when greater sums are required at once. For it is considered as a part of the weekly expense, and so spared in other things: but without some arrangement of this kind, the fund which should have been reserved for charitable uses is often previously spent on superfluities, and the sum required cannot well be afforded. Those weekly collections, therefore, which are made by several excellent societies, and, blessed be God, are becoming more and more general; in which even poor mechanics and laborers, nay children, by the constant payment of trivial contributions, raise annually large sums for the relief of the sick and destitute, and for aiding the distribution of the scriptures, and the cause of missions into all regions; cannot be too warmly recommended. Much real good is done by them; the gospel is adorned and recommended; and the young and the poor are taught to re-trench needless expenses, and to save that they may be able to give. Thus habits of the best and most useful kind are formed, which conduce eventually likewise to their own temporal comfort and benefit: while an excellent example is exhibited, and the rich are excited to a proportionable liberality. May such societies be established in all the churches of Christ!

These charitable works well consist with the design of the Christian sabbath.—But when the funds are raised, prudent, pious, disinterested, and humane persons should be chosen to apply them: nor ought any man to count such a service foreign to his place, except he be necessarily engaged in still more important services. (Note, Acts 6:2—6.)—All our purposes should be formed in submission to the will of God; and our conduct should be regulated by the dispensations of his providence, in connexion with the precepts of his word.—Ministers ought not readily to leave those places, in which "great and effectual doors are opened to them," even though there be many adversaries: nay, this circumstance may often render it more incumbent on them to continue in their post, though dangerous and difficult; that they may establish and encourage the weak or wavering. (Notes, Neh. 6:10—14. Acts 6:1—6.)—It is wonderful that those who attend on the work of the Lord, in the most faithful manner, should have cause to fear, even among professors of the gospel; or be in danger of being despised and disquieted by them. Yet the prevalence of party, the influence of corrupt teachers, or the infection of antinomian principles, frequently produce this effect: especially when those who are required to "reprove, rebuke, and exhort with all authority," are young, diffident, or deficient in external accomplishments. But senior ministers should use their influence to repress this spirit; that their faithful young brethren may be secured from contempt, enabled to do their work in peace, and receive due kindness from those among whom they labor.

V. 12—24.

The zealous servants of Christ are commonly harmonious among themselves, even when their injudicious hearers place them in competition with each other. They concur in opposing every error and evil, though they may have different opinions, about the best method of remedying them; and therefore they will leave others to follow their own judgment, even when different from their own.—Exhortations to vigilance, constancy in duty, steadfastness in the faith, and mutual love, can never be unseasonable. Those who have "addicted themselves to the labor" of love, in ministering to the saints, are most worthy of respect and imitation; and not they who are most fluent in speech, and forward to assume the lead in public concerns. We should also willingly submit to those, who are experienced and mature in the faith of Christ; or who labor to promote that cause, for which the apostles spent and laid down their lives.—Faithful and pious persons may supply what is lacking in each other; and their conversation will refresh the spirits of such as are like-minded.—Christians, though divided by seas and mountains, and though they disapprove of some things in each other's creed or practice, will yet cordially love and pray for one another. But they, who "love not the Lord Jesus Christ," can be Christians only in name; and they must certainly abide under an awful curse, which the Lord when he cometh will execute. (P. O. Matt. 25:41—46.) Our obligations to the divine Saviour, and our reasons for loving him, are infinite: yet many, who are called by his name, who profess his truth, nay, who preach his gospel, are strangers to this holy love, and only seek their own advantage, credit, ease, or pleasure, in their religious performances. They may conceal this fatal defect from the most discerning of their fellow-servants; but "the Lord when he cometh" will surely detect it. Let us then call ourselves to account in this matter, and not be satisfied with any religion, which does not include and express the supreme love of Christ, earnest desires of his salvation, gratitude for his mercies, zeal for his glory, and obedience to his commandments. Let us inquire, whether we do indeed "count all things" worthless, compared with Christ and his righteousness; whether we be willing to give up worldly objects when they come in competition with him; whether we love his image in his people; and be willing to deny ourselves, that we may communicate to their wants; whether we love his ordinances, as means of communion with him; whether we rejoice to hear him glorified, and grieve to see him dishonored; whether we allow ourselves in any known sin, or the neglect of any known duty; whether we keep his commandments unreservedly and habitually; yet grieve that we keep them not more perfectly; (Notes, John 14:15—24. 15:12—16. 21:15—17.) and whether we copy his example and long to be conformed to him, being greatly humbled by the consciousness of imitating him in so defective a measure, and of being so little transformed into his holy image. By these inquiries, impartially answered, we may form a good judgment of the state of our souls.—But, while we warn those around us not to deceive themselves, we should beware of the appearance of anger and resentment. We should affectionately and zealously long that the grace of Christ may be with those, whom we thus caution; and we ought to assure those of our cordial love in Christ, whom we reprove and warn in the most plain and solemn manner, and who have acted the most improperly towards us.

THIS epistle seems to have been written about a year after the foregoing, while the apostle was on his progress through Macedonia. Having heard by Titus, that his first epistle had produced very good effects on many of the Corinthians; he wrote this also, in order to prepare the way more completely for his visit to them; and it is probable, that he sent it immediately by Titus and some others who accompanied him. (Notes, 2:12, 13. 7:5—7.) In it he justified himself from the charge of levity, or worldly policy, in delaying his journey to Corinth; and assigned those reasons for this part of his conduct, which could not have been disclosed with propriety, till the effect of his former epistle had appeared. (Note, 1:15—24.) He also gave directions respecting the restoration of the incestuous person, who had been excommunicated. (2:) He then expatiated on his own conduct in the Christian ministry; intermixing many exhortations with the avowal of his motives and fervent affections, in his sacred work. (3:—7:) With great address and earnestness he recommended to them the collections for the poor Christians at Jerusalem, and showed the manifold advantages of such services. (8: 9:) At length, he more directly, yet evidently with great reluctance, contrasted his own gifts, labors, sufferings, and conduct, with the pretences of their false teachers; and showed himself "not a whit" inferior to any of the apostles. He then concluded with various admonitions and affectionate good wishes or prayers. (10:—13:)—These epistles may appear, to some readers, less interesting than several others; because they mainly refer to the peculiar circumstances of the Corinthian church; but in fact they are the more instructive on that very account: as directions and admonitions, suited to many of the more ordinary incidents of life, are communicated by them; which could not have been so advantageously adduced, in a more general discourse on the great doctrines and duties of Christianity.

The most remarkable circumstance in this epistle, is the confidence of the apostle in the goodness of his cause, and in the power of God to bear him out in it. Opposed, as he then was, by a powerful and sagacious party, whose authority, reputation, and interest were deeply concerned, and who were ready to seize on every thing which could discredit him; it is wonderful to hear him, so firmly insist on his apostolical authority; and so unreservedly appeal to the miraculous powers, which he had exercised and conferred at Corinth. So far from shrinking from the contest, as afraid of some discovery being made, unfavorable to himself, or to the common cause; he, with great modesty and meekness indeed, but with equal boldness and decision, expressly declares that his opposers and despisers were "the ministers of Satan;" and menaces to inflict on them miraculous judgments, when as many of their deluded hearers had been brought to repentance, and re-established in the faith, as should in a reasonable time be influenced by the use of proper means. It is inconceivable that a stronger internal testimony, not only of integrity, but of divine inspiration, can exist. Had there been any thing of imposture among the Christians, it was next to impossible, but such a conduct must have occasioned the disclosure of it.

CHAP. I.

The apostle salutes the Corinthians, 1,2; and blesses God for consolations proportioned to his tribulations, and deliverance in extreme danger, lately vouchsafed to him; being intended for the benefit and comfort of others also, as well as an earnest to him of future deliverances, 3—11. He rejoices in the testimony of his conscience; and expresses his confidence of their attachment to him, which had induced him to purpose a journey to Corinth, 12—16. His delay of this journey did not arise from fickleness, 17,18. He states the stability of the promises of God through Christ, and the security of believers, 19—22; and declares, that he had postponed his visit from lenity towards the Christians at Corinth, 23,24.

PAUL, an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God, and <sup>b</sup> Timothy our brother, unto <sup>c</sup> the church of God which is at Corinth, with <sup>d</sup> all the saints which are in all <sup>e</sup> Achaia.

2 <sup>f</sup> Grace be to you and peace from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

3 <sup>g</sup> Blessed be God, even <sup>h</sup> the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, <sup>i</sup> the Father of mercies, and <sup>k</sup> the God of all comfort;

4 Who <sup>l</sup> comforteth us in all our tribulation, <sup>m</sup> that we may be able to comfort them which are in any trouble, by the comfort wherewith we ourselves are comforted of God.

5 For <sup>n</sup> as the sufferings of Christ abound in us, <sup>o</sup> so our consolation also aboundeth by Christ.

6 And <sup>p</sup> whether we be afflicted, it is for your consolation and salvation, which is <sup>q</sup> effectual in the enduring of the same sufferings which we also suffer; or whether we be comforted, it is for your consolation and salvation.

7 And <sup>r</sup> our hope of you is steadfast, knowing, that <sup>s</sup> as ye are partakers of the sufferings, so shall ye be also of the consolation.

Note.—The apostle joined his beloved Timothy with himself, in this 'Second Epistle to the Corinthians'; that he might establish his reputation and influence among them. Hence we learn that Timothy was come to him, from Ephesus, before he wrote it. (Note, 1 Cor. 16:10,11.) 'He calls Timothy his brother, 'probably, that he might not be despised for his 'youth.' Whitby. He addressed the epistle, not only to the church of God at Corinth, but also to "all the saints which are in all Achaia;" all professed Christians, who are to be considered as saints in the judgment of charity: yet formalists and hypocrites could not be included, or conjoined in those descriptions of character, and appropriation of privileges and promises, which cannot possibly belong to any except true Christians. (Marg. Ref. a-f.—Notes, Rom. 1:1—7. 1 Cor. 1:1—3.)—After the usual salutation, he abruptly broke forth in thanks and praises to God, "the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," and of all believers in him, as "the Father of mercies," the Source and Author of every kind of mercy to sinful men, abounding in mercy, and delighting in mercy: and as "the God of all comfort," the inexhaustible and everlasting Spring of peace, joy, and consolation to all who trusted in him.—'It is 'observable that eleven of St. Paul's epistles 'begin with exclamations of joy, praise, and 'thanksgiving. As soon as he thought of a 'Christian church, planted in one place or another; there seems to have been a flow of 'most lively affection accompanying the idea, 'in which all sensibility of his temporal afflictions, or theirs, were swallowed up; and the 'fulness of his heart must vent itself in such 'cheerful, exalted, and devout language.' Doddridge. (Marg. Ref. g-k.—Notes, Eph. 1:3—8. Phil. 1:3—6. Col. 1:3—8. 1 Thes. 1:1—4. 2 Thes. 1:3,4. 1 Pet. 1:3—5.)—Good tidings from the churches, which had been planted by him, always animated the apostle; and his heart was now full of satisfaction in what he had lately heard from Corinth by Titus. (Note, 7:5—7.) He therefore blessed God for animating and comforting him and his companions in labor, amidst all their troubles and persecutions; that they might be able to encourage others who were in trouble, by suggesting the same topics which God had made use of for their comfort. They could also assure their brethren of the sufficiency of divine consolations: seeing, in their own case they had experienced, that, as "the sufferings of Christ," or, sufferings for Christ's sake, and such as he endured, "abounded" in them; so their "consolations also abounded" in proportion, by the grace of Christ, and the joy of his salvation. (Marg. Ref. h—o.) When therefore they were afflicted; they considered their painful trials, as allotted them, in order to qualify them for their work, in promoting the consolation and salvation of their hearers. These blessings were efficaciously communicated to the souls of believers, by means of sufferings similar to those of the apostle: (Notes, 4:13—18. Rom. 5:3—5.) and the example of constancy, patience, and fortitude, which he and his brethren exhibited, helped to embolden their brethren for sufferings, and to animate them in persevering under them; (Note, Phil. 1:12—14.) and their experimental and sympathizing exhortations and instructions led them to behave properly under their trials, and to derive benefit from them. On the other hand, when the apostle and his helpers were comforted, their consolations were intended for the encouragement of the people also; as tending to illustrate the faithfulness of God to his promises, and his gracious readiness to support those who suffered for his sake; and by showing them how comfort might be found. considerations both reconciled zealous Christians to sufferings, and rendered consolations doubly welcome. (Marg. Ref. p.) The apostle's hope, concerning the church at Corinth, in general, was rendered steadfast, by what he had heard, notwithstanding all that had been reprehensible: as it was evident, that, with only few exceptions, they shared in his sorrows and uneasiness, and were willing to partake of "his sufferings for Christ's sake;" and therefore he was assured, that they would partake also of "his consolation in Christ."—Even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, &c. (3) This style seems to be adopted under the New Testament, to distinguish "the one living and true God," from all other objects of worship, without excepting the Supreme Being of Deists and infidels: as that of "the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob," had been under the Old Testament, to distinguish JEHOVAH, from Baal, or Jupiter, or other imagined deities. (Notes, 1 Kings 18:18—21,36—39. 22:6.) None was the true God, under the Old Testament, but "the God of Abraham, &c." none under the New is the true God but "the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ." [Practical Observations.]

Note.—Some think that the apostle here referred to his sufferings at Lystra in Asia Minor; (Note, Acts 14:8—12.) but these occurred so many years before, that he would scarcely have thus mentioned them on this occasion. He seems to have written this Epistle from Philippi, or at least when he was in Macedonia: Ephesus was the chief city of Asia, according to the sense in which the apostle always uses that word; (Note, Acts 19:8—12.) and, as he had just before been driven away from Ephesus, by Demetrius and the tumult excited by him, it is most probable, that he referred to the furious persecutions during that scene of riot and outrage. (Note, Acts 19:23—41.)—'It may be said, perhaps, that it does not appear from the history, that any danger threatened St. Paul's life, in the uproar at Ephesus, so imminent as that, from which in the epistle he represents himself to have been delivered. This matter, it is true, is not stated by the historian in form; but the personal danger of the apostle, we cannot doubt, must have been extreme, when the whole city was filled with confusion; when the populace had seized his companions; when, in the distraction of his mind, he insisted on coming forth amongst them; when the Christians who were about him would not suffer him; when his friends, certain of the chief of Asia, sent to him, desiring that he would not adventure himself into the tumult; when, lastly, he was obliged to quit, immediately, the place and the country; and "when the tumult was ceased, to depart into Macedonia." ... Nothing could be more expressive of the circumstances, in which the history describes him to have been, at the time when the epistle purports to have been written, (than the verses under consideration.) ... It is the calm recollection of a mind, emerged from the confusion of instant danger. It is that devotion and solemnity of thought, which follows a recent deliverance. There is just enough of particularity, in the passage, to show that it is to be referred to the tumult at Ephesus.' Paley.—The apostle, however, had been weighed down with distress, which was "out of measure" grievous, from the concurrence of outward dangers and hardships, with inward disquietude, about the state of the churches: so that his burden was insupportable by any strength which he had previously possessed; and he was by them led to despair, of being any longer preserved in life, to execute his plans of future usefulness. (Marg. Ref. s, t.) He even considered himself, as a condemned person, "having the sentence of death" in himself, in that he judged his doom inevitable. Nor indeed had he any method of escape, by his own contrivance or efforts, or any confidence in himself: but he was brought to trust in God alone, who by his almighty power "raiseth the dead," and was therefore able to rescue him. Accordingly, God had delivered him from so imminent a peril of death, when it seemed even to have taken hold of him; and he still continued to deliver him from the rage of his enemies: he therefore was encouraged to trust, that he would yet deliver him, and preserve his life for future usefulness. (Marg. Ref. u—y.—Notes, 1 Sam. 7:12. Acts 26:19—23. 2 Tim. 4:16—18.) This he expected in answer especially to the prayers of the Corinthians; who, he doubted not, had thus as-

12 For <sup>b</sup>our rejoicing is this, the testimony of our conscience, that in <sup>c</sup>simplicity and <sup>d</sup>godly sincerity, <sup>e</sup>not with fleshly wisdom, but by the grace of God, we have had our conversation in the world, and more abundantly to you-ward.

13 For we write none other things unto you, <sup>f</sup>than what ye read or acknowledge; and I trust ye shall acknowledge even to the end;

14 As also ye have acknowledged us <sup>g</sup>in part, <sup>h</sup>that we are your rejoicing, <sup>i</sup>even as ye also are ours <sup>k</sup>in the day of the Lord Jesus.

Note.—Many of the Corinthians had been prejudiced against the apostle; and several of them still insinuated things to his disadvantage: but amidst this discouragement, and all his other trials, he possessed a constant source of joy and exultation, "in the testimony of his conscience." For though, as a sinner, he could only "rejoice and glory in Christ Jesus;" (Note, 1 Cor. 1:26—31.) yet, as a believer, he might rejoice and "glory" in his inward consciousness of being truly what he professed and appeared to be; and especially in that he had been enabled to exercise his sacred ministry, with "simplicity" and singleness of heart, aiming at nothing but to glorify God by doing good to men; and in that "godly sincerity," that unadulterated integrity, which sprang from the fear and love of God, and approved itself to him. For he had not been warped by "fleshly wisdom," out of any concealed aim at his own interest, reputation, or authority, to use duplicity or dissimulation; but "by the grace of God" he had proceeded in forming and executing designs, planned and suited to promote the conversion of sinners, and the prosperity of the church; without regarding the reproaches and sufferings, to which he was constantly exposed on that account. (Marg. Ref. b—e.) This had been his habitual conduct, in every part of the world, ever since he had been called to profess and preach the gospel: but he had more abundantly manifested a disinterested, self-denying spirit, with "simplicity and godly sincerity," in his whole behavior towards the church at Corinth; though they had been the first to suspect him, and accuse him of the contrary. (Note, 12:11—21.) He, however, now wrote no other things, than what they had read in the former Epistle, or than appeared to be the obvious meaning of his words: that is, he wrote to them in candor and artless simplicity, not covering his designs by specious and ambiguous language: nay, he wrote nothing but what most of them knew and acknowledged to be true, and he trusted would acknowledge to the end. (Marg. Ref. f.—Note, 5:9—12.) They had indeed acknowledged him "in part," or "part of them," to have been the instrument of their conversion; and avowed that they rejoiced and gloried in their relation to him, and in his attention to them: and this was no more than corresponded to his rejoicing, or glorying, in them, and on their account; which he trusted would be continued even unto "the day of the Lord Jesus," who should come to judge the world. (Marg. Ref. g—k.—Note, 1 Cor. 15:31—34.)

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—Confiding in "the testimony of his conscience," and in the attachment of his brethren at Corinth, the apostle had purposed to visit them before that time; in the firm persuasion, that, according to his earnest desires, they would derive "a second benefit" from him, for their establishment and consolation by grace. (Notes, Rom. 1:8—12. 15:22—29.) This shows, he had been only once at Corinth, at this time. (Note, 12:14,15.) He had intended to pass by Corinth in his way to Macedonia, and to call as he went, and then afterwards to return, and make a longer abode with them. This must have been his plan, for Corinth was out of his way into Macedonia: nor could it be supposed that he would come near that city, except in order to visit the Christians there. (Note, 1 Cor. 16:5—9.) Probably, he had given some other intimation of his purpose to the Corinthians, than that which is contained in the former epistle. He, however, saw reason to alter his plan, and to go into Macedonia by Troas. (Notes, Acts 20:1—6.)

17 When I therefore was thus minded, did I use °lightness? or the things that I purpose, do I purpose <sup>p</sup> according to the flesh, that with me there should be <sup>a</sup> yea yea, and nay nay?

18 But <sup>r</sup> as God is true, our * word toward you was not yea and nay.

19 For <sup>s</sup> the Son of God, Jesus Christ, who was preached among you by us, <sup>t</sup> even by me and Silvanus and Timotheus, <sup>u</sup> was not yea and nay, but in him was yea.

20 For <sup>x</sup> all the promises of God in him are yea, and in him <sup>y</sup> Amen, <sup>z</sup> unto the glory of God by us.

Note.—The apostle’s opponents, at Corinth, seem to have urged his deviation from his first purpose, though made on the wisest considerations, and for the most benevolent purposes, as a proof that he was an inconstant and unstable man; who altered his conduct and doctrine, as circumstances required, and as suited his present conveniency. But would they believe such accusations against him? Would the Christians in that city ascribe his conduct to levity? Or would they conclude, that his purposes were formed, and changed, from worldly policy; so that he affirmed or denied, taught or retracted, as it best suited his quiet, safety, interest, or ambition? Some of them might indeed suspect him of this, and make it an argument against his doctrine: but, “as God,” to whom he made his appeal, was “true,” and faithful, so his word, or preaching to them, was not proposed in this fickle and wavering manner: he had never contradicted what he had once taught them, nor said “nay” in any point, after he had once said “yea” respecting it; but he had steadily persisted in one uniform testimony. So that the doctrine, preached by him, Silas, and Timothy, had been like its great Author, “the Son of God, Jesus the Messiah,” who is “the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever.” (Marg. Ref. o—u.—Note. Heb. 13:7,8.) Thus he and his fellow-laborers, had proposed the salvation of Christ to the Corinthians, with the most entire consistency and unwavering steadfastness. They had not said first “yea,” and then “nay,” in these grand concerns; but had constantly declared, that all salvation was to be found in him alone; and that the covenant of grace, and all its engagements, were fully confirmed in him, to all who are found one with him by faith, and the participation of his life-giving Spirit. (Marg. Ref. x. y.) In these doctrines, they had been most explicit and decided: though in various matters of less importance, they had used a prudent self-denying accommodation; and had been careful not to instruct the people in the deeper mysteries of Christianity, before they were able to bear them. (Notes, 1 Cor. 3:1—9.) In this uniform and constant testimony the apostle persisted; because he knew, that “all the promises” of God to his people, throughout the scripture, were made in and by Jesus Christ, and that all centered in him, the great Surety of the new covenant, according to which they are made to men; and that, by giving his Son to be the Saviour of sinners, God had verified his ancient predictions, demonstrated the divine original of the scriptures, and given an assurance of fulfilling his largest promises to all believers. Thus he had, as it were, set his irrevocable Amen to the promises, which he had before given; he had confirmed them by the surest evidence which could be imagined; he had, indeed, pledged his own glory for the performance of them; his truth and perfections would be dishonored, if they should fail of accomplishment: while the performance of them would every way redound to the glory of God, in the salvation of all believers, by means of the preaching of the apostles and other ministers.—“There is a yea, which is as a nay, and ‘a nay, which is as yea; viz. when a man asserts, or denies a thing ironically: but the just man’s yea is yea, and his nay is nay. When ‘a man gives a bill of divorce to his wife, we ‘try him ... three times, whether his nay be nay, and his yea yea.’ Jewish writers in Whitby. (Notes, Matt. 5:33—37. Jam. 5:12. Rev. 3:14—16.)

22 Who hath also <sup>c</sup> sealed us, and given the <sup>d</sup> earnest of the Spirit in our hearts.

Note.—The apostle's "established" belief of these truths, his reliance on these promises, and constancy in his ministry, were not the result of human wisdom, or outward teaching, or natural firmness and fortitude; but were effected by the power of God, who had brought the Corinthians also to a steadfast faith in Christ, and to fellowship with him. God had "anointed them," by his teaching and sanctifying grace; and so, removed their natural blindness and prejudice against the truth. (Marg. Ref. a, b.—Notes, 1 John 2:20—29. Rev. 1:4—6.) He had also "sealed them," both to mark them for his own, and to secure them to himself, by enstamping the divine image upon their souls, through the new-creating power of his Spirit; whose graces and holy consolations were the "earnest," pledge, and foretaste in their hearts, of the heavenly inheritance, to which they were called. (Marg. Ref. c, d.—Notes, 5:5—8. Rom. 8:14—17, 18—23.) From these causes the apostle derived his constancy and confidence in preaching the Gospel; and believers were influenced by them to hold fast their faith without wavering.—Some indeed interpret "the anointing," of miraculous powers, and "the seal," of the sacraments; but without any satisfactory proof: but it is far more consistent with the tenor of scripture, to explain "the anointing" of such divine communications as belong to Christians in general, and of which none else partake.—Sacraments are but outward seals of the covenant, and neither distinguish believers from others, nor secure salvation to all who partake of them; (Note, Rom. 4:9—12.) and miraculous powers have been exercised by very wicked men, and have long since ceased in the church: but the renewal of the divine image on the soul, in sanctification, and "the love of God shed abroad in the heart by the Holy Spirit," form through every age a seal and earnest, of a far more distinguishing and permanent nature. (Notes, Rom. 5:3—5. Eph. 1:13, 14. 4:30—32, v. 30. 2 Tim. 2:19.)

23 Moreover <sup>e</sup> I call God for a record upon my soul, <sup>f</sup> that to spare you I came not as yet unto Corinth.

Note.—Having thus vindicated his conduct and doctrine from the charge of inconsistency;

the apostle, in the most solemn manner, called God to witness the truth of what he was about to assert: he desired that he would testify for him, or against him, as he saw the case to be; and he could expect nothing but awful judgments "on his soul," if he spake falsely after such an appeal. (Marg. Ref. e.—Notes, 11:7—12, 28—31. Rom. 9:1—3. Phil. 1:7, 8.) With this most awful introduction, which is a peculiarly solemn oath, on a highly important occasion, (Note, Ex. 20:7.) he declared, that he had postponed his visit to Corinth, in order to spare them those censures and miraculous judgments, which he feared would have been unavoidable, if he had gone thither immediately on leaving Ephesus. He had not then received any information what effect his former epistle had produced: he was aware, that time would be required to bring their affairs into a better state; and he thought it more advisable to wait a little longer, that he might at length come, not "with a rod, but in love and in the spirit of meekness." (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 2:1—4. 10:7—11. 12:17—21. 13:1—4. 1 Cor. 4:18—21, v. 21.) He did not mean by this to claim any despotic authority in dictating to them, as of himself, what they should believe: or even to insist, in a dogmatical manner, on their receiving every particular which he taught them by the command of Christ. He had not thus usurped dominion, or "lorded it over them, in respect of the faith," as the clause may be rendered; but had acted hitherto, and was still disposed to act, with gentleness and forbearance, as a "helper of their joy" and consolation in Christ, by his instructions, admonitions, and counsels. (Marg. Ref. g, h.—Notes, Matt. 20:24—28. Luke 22:24—27. Phil. 1:21—26. 1 Pet. 5:1—4.) Yet he deemed it necessary, as the servant and representative of Christ, to act with authoritative decision, and even sharpness, against such as perverted the gospel and corrupted its doctrines; for "by faith" believers stood accepted with God, and were enabled to stand steadfast amidst trials and temptations. (Marg. Ref. t.—Notes, 5:5—8. Rom. 5:1, 2. 1 Cor. 15:1, 2. Eph. 6:14—17. 1 Pet. 5:8, 9.) Those persons, therefore, who perverted the faith, by false doctrines and corrupt practices, were about to take from true Christians that support, by which they stood; to cause them to fall into various evils; to mar their joy; and to do them immense mischief, if not opposed. As "helpers of their joy," therefore, the apostle and his friends must take a decided part against these enemies to their holiness and comfort.—The tenet, that we are at first indeed justified by faith, but are preserved in a justified state by works, is diametrically opposite to this apostolical decision.

cates his grace: all therefore who belong to it are "saints;" devoted and conformed unto him; and should act, as it "becometh saints." Many persons, however, of a different character intrude among them; but "grace and peace from God our Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ," belong to the saints alone.—Those who through grace have believed in Christ" should ever be ready to bless and praise our God, even amidst sharp sufferings. He is "the Father of mercies and the God of all comfort;" nor can we expect too much from his infinite compassion and love; or too highly celebrate the praises of what he has already done for us.—We must indeed expect tribulations: they are needful, profitable, and unavoidable; and they, who have been most honored by the Lord Jesus, have also been most conformed to him in sufferings: but he proportions his consolations to the troubles of those who simply trust and serve him; and he thus renders them capable of "comforting others, by the comfort with which they are comforted of God." The afflictions and consolations of ministers, especially, are often intended for the sake of the people, as well as themselves; that, by their own example, experience, counsels, and exhortations, they may promote "the consolation and salvation of others also." For these blessings are commonly brought home to the hearts of men, and the word of God is rendered "effectual" for every saving purpose, by means of trials and afflictions: and the minister, who is a stranger to sufferings and divine consolations, can seldom duly sympathize with the mourners, counsel the tempted, encourage the dejected, or even "bear with the infirmities of the weak." This should reconcile us to our sorrows and trials, and teach us to seek benefit from them; and it should animate us to more earnest prayer, for proportionable grace and consolation, that we may exhibit an edifying example under afflictions: for assuredly we shall rejoice in heaven on account of the sharpest sufferings, which have been rendered subservient to our salvation, and that of any of those, whom our gracious Lord owns as his friends, brethren, and near relations. (Notes, Matt. 12:46—50. 25:34—40. John 15:12—16. Heb. 2:10—13.)—We may form "a steadfast hope" of those professed Christians, who sympathize with the afflicted servants of Christ, and are willing to suffer for his sake; being confident that, as they "partake of the sufferings, they shall also share the consolations" of his gospel.—The Lord, sometimes, permits his children to be pressed "out of measure, even above strength," and to be driven almost to despair of deliverance; that, having "the sentence of death in themselves," they may learn, more simply, to trust in his almighty power and all-sufficient grace. This often occurs in the concerns of their own souls: inward temptations and conflicts, connected with outward difficulties, fill them with desponding fears and anxieties; they are made to feel that infinite mercy and omnipotent grace alone can preserve them from the most terrible downfalls, nay, even from final ruin. Thus they are driven from self-confidence, and learn to cast themselves wholly on God: and when he hath repeatedly "rescued them from so great a death," they admire his truth, power, and love; and are encouraged to hope, that he will yet deliver them, and make them victorious over all their enemies. (Notes, 12:7—10. P. O. Job 9:) In such scenes of conflict and terror, especially, we feel that we need the prayers of our brethren: and we ought thence to learn to pray for all who are tried and tempted, as well as to unite in thanksgivings with such as have received gracious deliverances. Thus all our trials and mercies, being mixed with prayers and praises, will terminate in the glory of God, and in our own and each other's spiritual advantage. And even the most afflicted Christian, who is fully assured of eternal felicity, ought to desire and value life; as long as God is pleased to make him useful to the souls of men, and an instrument, either by active service or patient suffering, of promoting his glory.

V. 12—16.

If we would have comfort amidst troubles, reproaches, suspicions, and slanders, we must seek for "the rejoicing in the testimony of our conscience." Indeed, provided we are upright in our professed repentance, and faith in Christ and his atoning blood; and careful to serve the Lord "in simplicity and godly sincerity," according to our places in his church and in the community; and "if we have our conversation in the world, not by fleshly wisdom, but by the grace of God;" we may greatly exult in these evidences of our acceptance in Christ, and our adoption into the family of God; and may take this comfort, as an abundant counterpoise to every calumny, and even as a sure anticipation of the favorable sentence of our Judge, in the great day of account. (Notes, Acts 23:1—5. 24:10—21. Rom. 8:14—17.) Yet we should not wonder, if we are suspected by those persons to whom, and for those actions in which, we have behaved most conscientiously. Sometimes "simplicity and godly sincerity" may require that line of conduct, which, to superficial or prejudiced observers, will have a contrary appearance: and, on many occasions, a man may be deemed inconstant, because he will not go the whole length of a party, and coincide with them in their follies, mistakes, and sins. (Note, 1 Cor. 2:14—16.) We should, however, leave our characters in the hands of God; only using proper means to clear them, when the credit of the gospel, or our usefulness, calls for it.—Ministers, and the people who have profited by their labors, ought now to rejoice in each other, as they may expect to do at the last day. Whatever interferes with this reciprocal joy and affection, should be guarded against: and believers should be very careful, not to grieve, by neglect and unkindness, those faithful friends, to whom, under God, they owe their eternal salvation; and who are concerned for their best welfare, with all the tenderness of affectionate parents. And ministers should desire to visit their beloved people from whom they have been separated, not only for the comfort of their company, but especially that the people may have still further benefit from them.

V. 17—24.

It is very unjust and uncandid, to ascribe every alteration, in a man's purpose or conduct, to lightness, instability, duplicity, or carnal policy; especially when his general character bears another stamp, and when there may be good reasons for the change which has taken place. If we are thus unjustly censured or suspected, we must make our appeal to God: yet it behoves us to be steady and constant in our conduct and profession, as far as we can, that we may avoid "the appearance of evil." This is peculiarly incumbent on the preachers of "the Son of God, Jesus Christ," "the AMEN, the true and faithful Witness," "in whom all the promises of God" are given and confirmed, in the most steadfast and unchangeable manner, "to the glory of God by us." What he has already done leaves no room for us to doubt the exact performance of every promise to all believers. His word, covenant, and dispensations are so ordered, as to give encouragement to the weakest faith. We may not only say, "Hath he spoken, and will he not do it?" Has he interposed with an oath, and will he now fail those, who "flee for refuge to lay hold on this hope set before them?" But "he that spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all; how shall he not with him freely give us all things?" Yet unbelief excludes men from the blessing; and many believers come short of comfort, because they are distrustful, and "of little faith." If then, we have been "established in Christ" with these ancient believers, it is God that has done this great thing for us. The sacred unction of his grace, the seal and earnest of his Spirit, and those holy tempers and gracious fruits, which attend our confidence and consolations, secure us from delusion in so important a matter, and distinguish genuine holy experience from all the joys of hypocrites, enthusiasts, and apostates.—We should never "call God to witness," except on important occasions, and in the most solemn manner; when other ways of ascertaining the truth, and avouching our integrity, are insufficient, and momentous concerns are at stake: yet the example of the apostle, under the immediate inspiration of the Holy Spirit, fully proves that solemn oaths, in some cases, are both lawful and expedient. "The record of God" will be on our souls, either to justify or condemn us: he "will not hold those guiltless, who take his name in vain;" and we ought so to act, that, in all ordinary cases, "our yea yea, nay nay," may be sufficient to ensure credit to our testimony. (Notes, Matt. 5:33—37. Jam. 5:12.)—If the apostle did not exercise "dominion over the faith" of Christians; we should by no means "call men master," or "father," or implicitly submit to their decisions and assertions; nor should we ever attempt "to lord it," in this manner, "over" any part of "God's heritage." We ought to remember, that ministers are the "helpers of the joy" of believers; and we should seek the increasing comfort of our brethren, with prudent and persevering tenderness and affection. Yet as Christians "stand by faith" only, and all their joys must flow from the vigorous, uninterrupted, and authorized exercise of that leading principle; so every thing that tends to weaken, mislead, and subvert the faith of professed Christians, must be watched against and opposed. Sometimes therefore genuine love, and a wise desire of helping the joy of believers, will dictate sharp rebukes and decided censures of those, who would deceive and corrupt them. It is, however, best to use more lenient measures, as far as there is a prospect of success; and to avoid even the appearance of severity, if it can be done consistently with prudence and faithfulness.

CHAP. II.

The apostle shows his purpose, of not coming to Corinth in heaviness; and states the grief with which he had written his former epistle, 1—4. He directs the Corinthians to forgive and restore the incontinent person; as he had forgiven him in Christ's name, 5—11. His uneasiness, at not finding Titus at Troas, had induced him to go directly into Macedonia, 12, 13. He blesses God for the joy and triumph, which had attended his faithful preaching of the gospel in every place, which he distinguishes from that of "many who corrupt the word of God," 14—17.

BUT<sup>a</sup> I determined this with myself, B<sup>b</sup> that I would not come again to you in heaviness.

2 For<sup>c</sup> if I make you sorry, who is he then that maketh me glad, but the same which is made sorry by me?

3 And<sup>d</sup> I wrote this same unto you, <sup>e</sup> lest when I came, I should have sorrow from them of whom<sup>f</sup> I ought to rejoice; <sup>g</sup> having confidence in you all, that my joy is the joy of you all.

4 For<sup>h</sup> out of much affliction and anguish of heart, I wrote unto you with many tears; <sup>i</sup> not that ye should be grieved, but that ye might know the love which I have more abundantly unto you.

Note.—The apostle had determined in himself, that he would not, if it could be avoided, make his intended visit to Corinth till he could go with comfort to himself and his brethren in that city. He expected that he should prevail with them by his epistles, to exclude such as remained refractory, and also recover many who had been drawn aside: and then he would be able to go among them, without that "heaviness" and distress of mind, which he must have felt, if constrained to re-establish his authority by censures and punishments. When he had before visited Corinth, he had received and communicated joy; and he was not willing to come the second time in a sorrowful manner. Even his steady friends must have shared the sorrow, if he had been forced to exercise severity; and so his journey must have been distressing to them and to him. (Marg. Ref. a—c.—Note, 1:23, 24.) He had therefore written before, and he now wrote again, in order that the prevailing abuses might be redressed; lest he should receive sorrow from the very persons, in whose holy and comfortable walking he ought to have rejoicing: and he was confident that they would approve of this plan; as he would not allow himself to doubt, but that "his joy was the joy of them all." The apostle certainly knew that this admitted of exceptions: but it was kind and prudent in him, to express his favorable opinion of the church in general; and to represent the disaffected party to be so small, as not to bear any proportion to his friends and adherents. He had indeed written the former epistle, especially those parts of it which contained rebukes, in great affliction, and constrained by "the anguish of his heart," at hearing many distressing reports concerning them; and he had wept abundantly at the painful necessity imposed on him: yet, he had not intended by it to cause them needless grief; but rather to convince them of his "more abundant love" to them, by performing this most self-denying and distressing act of Christian friendship; even contrary to their inclinations, and at the hazard of incurring their displeasure. 11 Lest <sup>u</sup> Satan should get an advantage of us: for we are not ignorant of his devices.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—(Notes, 1 Cor. 5:) The crime of the incestuous Corinthian, and the connivance at it by the church, had peculiarly troubled the apostle: but he had borne only a part of this grief, as many had shared it with him. This he mentioned, that he might not charge too much criminality on them, or be supposed to intimate that the Christians at Corinth had all alike been culpable in that matter. As to the offender himself, let the rebuke and excommunication which had been inflicted on him by "the many," (or by the church and its ministers, acting according to the sentence and command of the apostle;) suffice for his punishment. It appeared to have had a salutary effect: and therefore, instead of further severity, they ought <sup>v</sup> "to forgive and encourage him;" lest over-much sorrow should unfit him for his duty, or give Satan an opportunity of tempting him to hard thoughts of God and religion, to apostasy, or even to despair, which might swallow him up and occasion his ruin. (Marg. Ref. k—p.) The apostle would therefore now intreat for the offender, as he before protested against him: and he besought them to confirm their love to him, by restoring him to communion with them, and by sympathizing in his sorrow; that he might be assured their censures, though apparently severe, had proceeded from the same friendly and loving disposition.—Indeed he had written so decidedly on this subject to make trial of their prompt obedience to his apostolical authority; and their conduct had satisfied him that they were disposed to regard it in all things. He was therefore confident of their discretion; and ready, not only in this, but in similar instances, to concur with them in receiving again into their communion, as penitent and pardoned, those who had been laid under the censures of the church: this he would do for their benefit, in the presence of Christ, as representing his "person," and as acting by his authority. (Marg. Ref. q—t.—Notes, Matt. 16:19. John 20:19-23.) He was also the more desirous of thus concurring in the reconciliation of the offender, lest Satan, their subtle adversary, should obtain some advantage by their delay: either by tempting the offender to despondency; by bringing an evil report on Christians as rigorous and unforgiving; or by discouraging other offenders, deterring men from embracing the gospel, exciting further divisions in the church, or otherwise preventing the success of the gospel. For he was not ignorant of the manifold "devices" of that enemy; and by what varied machinations he endeavored to deceive and prejudice men's minds, and to disturb the peace of the church. (Marg. Ref. u.)—It is observable, that the apostle carefully avoided mentioning the name of this scandalous offender.

Note.—After Paul had been driven from Ephesus, he went to Troas, in his way to Macedonia; intending to remain for a short time in that city, to preach the gospel, of which a very favorable opportunity presented itself. (Marg. Ref. x, v.—Notes, Acts 20:1–6.) But, not meeting Titus there, according to his expectation, and having received no tidings from Corinth, his mind was so discomposed about the affairs of that church, that he could not comfortably continue at Troas. He therefore hastened into Macedonia to meet Titus, which he accordingly did; and his report had determined him to write this second epistle, and then to proceed leisurely, through the churches of Macedonia, before he visited Corinth. 14 Now <sup>c</sup> thanks be unto God, <sup>d</sup> which always causeth us to triumph in Christ, and maketh manifest <sup>e</sup> the savor of his knowledge by us in every place.

15 For we are unto God <sup>f</sup> a sweet savor of Christ, <sup>g</sup> in them that are saved, and in them that perish:

16 To the one we are <sup>h</sup> the savor of death unto death; and to the other the savor of life unto life: and <sup>i</sup> who is sufficient for these things?

17 For we are not as many, <sup>k</sup> which * corrupt the word of God: <sup>l</sup> but as of sincerity, but as of God, in the sight of God, speak we in Christ.

Note.—The happy turn given to the affairs of the Corinthians; the confidence which the apostle entertained of success as to that perplexing business, in which he had been engaged respecting them; and his usefulness in other places, caused him to break forth in “thanks to God,” amidst all his difficulties and distresses. He had indeed sharp conflicts to sustain; but the Lord gave him such multiplied victories, that he went from city to city as a triumphant conqueror, in the cause of Christ. And as in triumphs abundance of odors were used; so the name and salvation of Jesus, (“as ointment poured forth,” Note, Cant. 1:3.) was a “sweet odor” diffused by him in every place: so that he, and his fellow-laborers, were pleasing and acceptable to God, by their testimony to Christ, and through his merits, as a sweet-smelling savor; (Marg. Ref. c—f.—Notes, Gen. 8:20–22, v. 22. Eph. 5:1,2. Phil. 4:14–20, v. 18.) nor was this the case only in respect of those who were saved by their means, but also in those who perished through unbelief: for in both respects God was glorified by their preaching. To the one, indeed, their doctrine was an occasion of aggravated condemnation, through the depraved state of their hearts, and their enmity to it or perversion of it; even as costly odors are sometimes pernicious, nay fatal, to diseased persons. But to the other, their doctrine was as a delightful odor, which exhilarates the spirits, renews health, and prolongs life; for, loving and embracing the salutary message, they found it to be unto life and salvation. (Marg. Ref. g, h.—Notes, Luke 2:33–35. John 3:19–21. Rom. 9:30–33. 1 Pet. 2:7,8.) As, however, such infinitely important consequences were connected with the sacred ministry; and as faithfulness alone could render it acceptable and honorable to God, or profitable to men; who, of the human race, could of himself be “sufficient” for such a service? Or who would dare to engage in it without trembling? (Note, 3:4–6.)—This obliquely hinted at the self-sufficiency of the Corinthian teachers: but they were more immediately intended, when he spake of “many” who sophisticated the word of God, as dishonest vintners do their wine; when they preserve something of the color and taste, but dilute it, or mix it up with other liquids which weaken it, prevent its efficacy, or even render it poisonous, in order to enhance their profits. Thus, these teachers preserved some important truths in their preaching, to render it more specious: but they corrupted it by human inventions, philosophical conjectures, or antinomian opinions; till it became inefficacious, and even pernicious, to the souls of men. (Marg. Ref. i—l.—Notes, 11:13–15. Col. 2:8,9.) This they did, to pay court to the prejudices and inclinations of their followers; that they might establish their own influence, and gratify their avarice and ambition. (Note, 2 Pet. 2:1–3.)—Learned men have differed greatly in opinion, about these corrupters of the gospel; whether they were Judaizing Christians, or Gentile converts, or heretics as the Gnostics in particular were: but, beyond all doubt, there were corrupters of the gospel at that time, of different descriptions, who perverted it in various ways. The apostle, however, was conscious that he was not actuated by any carnal or selfish motives, nor left to adopt and propagate delusions: on the contrary, in the most entire “sincerity and simplicity,” as sent by God and serving him; as influenced by his grace, and as acting in his sight; he spake of Christ and his salvation, in every place: without at all consulting his own interest, or the inclinations of his hearers, except in order to their profit. ## PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

We should always give pain reluctantly, even when it must be done: for, if we are of a truly Christian spirit, we shall share the grief which we occasion.—It is a common case for faithful ministers, to "have sorrow from those, of whom they ought to rejoice;" and to be deprived of comfort even from the seals of their ministry, through the necessity to which they are reduced of making them sorrowful: whereas "their joy ought to be the joy of all" the people. That part of an affectionate minister's work, which gives most offence, is often performed by him with "great affliction and anguish of heart, and with many tears," and by a kind of painful constraint. So far is he from intending to grieve his beloved people, that he does violence to his own feelings, and ventures their displeasure, from "his abundant affection to them;" and that he may, even against their will, preserve them, if possible, from the dangers, to which the artifices of deceivers, and their own inexperience, expose them. Ministers of this spirit and character will be careful "not to over-charge their brethren," and not to condemn them harshly or indiscriminately. They do not desire to magnify their own trials, or to multiply their complaints; they would have no censure employed, or continued in force, without evident necessity; they are ready to show kindness, and speak comfort to the penitent; and take pleasure in restoring the most grievous offenders "in the spirit of meekness," when it can be done consistently with the honor of the gospel, and the purity of the church; (Notes, Gal. 6:1—5. Jude 22—25.) and they will exhort others to assure the offenders of their love, when salutary rebukes or discipline have had their proper effect.—No man indeed has a right to exercise dominion over the faith of his brethren: but, as far as ministers act according to the commandments of Christ, they are authorized to expect obedience from the people: and they may sometimes properly make trial of it; yet they should always be ready to express a forgiving disposition. When church-censures, ministerial rebukes, or the reconciliation of offenders, are regulated according to the word of Christ, and as in his presence; they are valid, even as if he were present in person to ratify them.—We should always be upon our guard, "lest Satan get an advantage against us:" that subtle enemy knows how to avail himself of our mistakes, whether of ill-timed lenity, or needless severity: he buoys up men with presumption, or urges them to despair; he represents the ministers and professors of the gospel, as licentious, or as over-strict, just as appearances vary; he raises contradictory slanders, to prejudice men against the truth, or to destroy the peace of the church. We should therefore study, by attention to the scriptures, by careful observation, by watching our own experiences, by conferring with our brethren, and above all by fervent prayer, to get acquainted with "his devices," that we may be competent to counteract them.

V. 12—17.

It is perhaps impossible in this present state, to separate fervent active zeal from an over-anxious solicitude! and though we should not yield to any thing, which takes us off from our present services; yet it may sometimes be profitable for us to recollect, that even St. Paul could have "no rest in his spirit" in preaching at Troas, through his earnest desire to learn the state of the Corinthian church.—If, however, our hearts be right with God, our disquietudes will terminate in thanksgivings, our conflicts in victories and triumphs; and the labors of the faithful minister will be accepted and graciously rewarded by our God, whether his hearers be saved, or perish. But how dreadful is the case of numbers, to whom the blessed gospel itself becomes "the savor of death unto death;" and the faithful and affectionate endeavors of ministers, for their salvation, serve only to seal and aggravate their condemnation! (Notes, Is. 6:9,10. 2 Pet. 3:14—16.) This is a painful thought to the servants of Christ: as they would gladly be "the savor of life unto life" to all, who come within the sound of their voice, or who by any means can be made acquainted with their doctrine.—But how should the consideration of the consequences, which must follow on our preaching, to ourselves and our hearers, make us shrink back, as it were, under the consciousness of unworthiness and insufficiency! especially as so many still adulterate and "corrupt the word of God," to their own ruin, and that of their deluded followers. If this was the case even while the apostles were living, how is it at present? and what would holy Paul's verdict be in this day, concerning an immense proportion of professed teachers and rulers in the Christian church? May we then inquire how the case is with each of us; may we carefully watch ourselves in this matter; and seek the testimony of our consciences, under the teaching of the Holy Spirit, that "as of sincerity, as of God, in the sight of God, so we may speak in Christ!" May the Lord also send forth very many faithful and able ministers into his church, and stop the mouths of all false teachers: and may every Christian learn to distinguish between genuine shepherds, and all kinds of wolves and foxes in sheep's clothing! (Notes, Is. 56:9—12. Matt. 7:13—20.)

CHAP. III.

To obviate the charge of self-commendation; the apostle shows, that the conversion of the Corinthians was a sufficient attestation of Christ given to his ministry, 1—3. He ascribes all his sufficiency and success to God, 4,5; and shows the glory of the gospel to be superior to that of the law, 7—11: declaring that his plain speaking accorded to the nature of his ministry, which was less obscure than that of Moses, 12—14; stating the blindness of the Jews, which would be removed when they turned to the Lord, 15,16; and describing the liberty and progressive holiness, which arose from faith in Christ, and the illumination of the Holy Spirit, 17,18.

DO we <sup>a</sup> begin again to commend ourselves? or need we, as some others, <sup>b</sup> epistles of commendation to you, or letters of commendation from you?

3 Forasmuch as ye are manifestly declared to be <sup>f</sup> the epistle of Christ, <sup>g</sup> ministered by us, written not with ink, but with the Spirit of <sup>h</sup> the living God; <sup>i</sup> not in tables of stone, <sup>k</sup> but in fleshy tables of the heart.

Note.—(Note, 2:14—17.) The apostle's opponents would be ready to censure the foregoing declaration, as another instance of his "commending himself;" for it is probable, they alleged that his former epistle contained some examples of this kind: but could the Christians at Corinth in general suspect him of being actuated by so mean and selfish a motive? Did he or his friends need any human testimony to their character? Was there any occasion for other churches to give them recommendatory letters to the Corinthian church? Or that the Corinthians should thus testify to their character, for the satisfaction of other churches? This indeed was the case of some, who had come in among them with an ambiguous character and mission, and who wanted and received such recommendations; but the apostle had no need of them. For the Corinthians themselves were his "epistle of commendation;" it was "written in their hearts," (as some read it, perhaps without sufficient authority from manuscripts or copies,) and legible in their lives; so that men of every nation and language might read and understand the import of it. Or, he so valued this testimonial, and so loved them as the seals of his ministry, that he had this epistle, as it were, engraven in his heart. For they were "manifestly declared to all men, to be Christ's epistle," recommending his apostle's ministry, which he had employed him in framing. This was not written with ink, on paper, but by the Spirit of the living God; nor engraven, as the law of the ten commandments was, by the finger of God on tables of stones, but "on fleshy tables of the heart;" their hearts having been softened, humbled, and prepared to receive this divine impression, by the new-creating power of the Holy Spirit. (Marg. Ref. a—k.—Notes, Ex. 24:12—14. 31:18. 32:15—19. 34:1—4, 27. Deut. 4:13. 10:1—5. Heb. 8:7—13.)—As the apostle therefore firmly believed them to be true Christians; surely, they could not doubt that he was the apostle of Christ: their conversion sufficiently recommended him and his doctrine, and he needed no other testimonial. The language here used is remarkable. "The epistle of Christ, ministered by us." Christ wrote it, by the apostle, as his amanuensis:—"written ... with the Spirit of the living God."

What the Spirit does, is done by Christ. (Note, Rev. 2:6, 7, v. 7.)

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The preceding considerations gave the apostle "such confidence, through Christ," in his cause and in those things which pertained to God, that he spake to the Christians at Corinth concerning himself and his ministry, in that bold manner which they censured. Not that he or his associates professed any sufficiency for so important a trust and work, as "of themselves," or by any natural wisdom, ability, or good disposition, above other men: on the contrary, they were conscious, that they could not in any respect execute their ministry, faithfully or successfully, if left to themselves; that they could not 'think a good thought' without divine grace: they therefore made no estimation of themselves in this great concern; but allowed and were deeply sensible, that all their sufficiency was of God. (Marg. Ref. l—o.—(Note, John 1:16.) He indeed had made them "able, faithful," and successful ministers of the New Testament, or covenant, which was ratified with believers through the blood of Christ, and ensured to them all spiritual and eternal blessings: and, while they gave him all the glory, they could not but know what he had done for them and by them; and they must not shun to speak with authority and decision in this cause. Nor had they been the ministers only of a mere letter, but of a doctrine, which was accompanied by the operation of the Holy Spirit to render it efficacious: for the mere letter would have proved an occasion of condemnation and death to the hearers; but the Spirit gave life and salvation to them through the gospel. (Marg. Ref. p—t.—Notes, Rom. 1:13—16. 7:5, 6. 10:12—17. 1 Cor. 1:20—25. 2:3—5. 3:4—9.)—This is commonly understood restrictively, of the legal and evangelical dispensations contrasted with each other, and the context seems to favor this interpretation: yet it is not satisfactory, as proposed in a general manner; for the Mosaic dispensation was not a killing letter to all who were under it; nor is the gospel, in all cases, attended by the life-giving Spirit. But the Mosaic dispensation derived all its saving efficacy from the gospel, to which it referred; and, after the publication of Christianity, it became altogether "a killing letter" to those who cleaved to it. (Notes, Gal. 4:21—31. 5:1—6.) For the gospel was "the ministration of the Spirit," and the only doctrine through which life and salvation were communicated to sinners; as the apostle shows more fully in the next verses. The moral law indeed is universally "found unto death," to all who remain under it; but the ceremonies and types, together with the prophecies, gave ancient believers a general or indistinct discovery of mercy and grace, through the promised Saviour: yet these institutions, to unbelievers, were a mere lifeless form, which left them under the condemnation of the moral law, and even added to it. (Notes, Rom. 5:20, 21. 7:1—12.) But then it was to be remembered, that the gospel itself, and its ministers, are "a savor of death unto death" to unbelievers; who often make the same formal use of some evangelical truths, and an attendance on Christian ordinances, which the Jews did of the Mosaic ceremonies, and the traditions of the elders: and in this way and in many others, "the letter," even of the New Testament, "kills;" and it only gives life, when accompanied "by the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus." (Notes, 2:14—17. Rom. 8:1—4.)—To understand "the letter and the spirit," of a literal and an allegorical interpretation of scripture, is both foreign to the apostle's argument, and also palpably absurd and extremely dangerous. Some parts of scripture are allegorical, and must be so interpreted: but surely laws, doctrines, promises, exhortations, and historical facts, must be literally understood by all, who do not purposely seek to misunderstand them!

8 How shall not <sup>b</sup> the ministration of the Spirit be rather glorious?

9 For if <sup>c</sup> the ministration of condemnation be glory, much more doth <sup>d</sup> the ministration of righteousness <sup>e</sup> exceed in glory.

10 For even that which was made glorious <sup>f</sup> had no glory in this respect, by reason of the glory that excelleth.

11 For <sup>g</sup> if that which is done away was glorious, <sup>h</sup> much more that which remaineth is glorious.

Note.—The Corinthians undervalued the authority of the apostle, as "the minister of Christ;" but he here showed them, how far the ministry of the New Testament excelled that of the Old. The moral law alone "was written and engraven in stones;" and it was properly the "ministration of death and condemnation," by leaving every transgressor under the curse denounced by it: (Note, Gal. 3:6—14.) but the unbelieving Jews turned the whole Mosaic dispensation into a mere covenant of works, to their own condemnation. Both "the holy, just, and good law," and the ritual institution as connected with it and introductory to the gospel, "were glorious:" the whole had the stamp of divinity upon it; and was expressive of the justice, holiness, and truth of God. (Marg. Ref. x, y. c. g.—Note, Deut. 32:4.) As an emblem of this, "the face of Moses," when he came down from the mount, with the tables of the law, and the ratification of the Sinai covenant, shone in such a manner, that the Israelites could not steadfastly look at it; which caused him to wear a veil in their presence. (Marg. Ref. z.—Notes, Ez. 34:27—35.) This represented the glory of that dispensation, which was to be abolished by the introduction of the new covenant in Christ. (Note, Heb. 8:7—13.) If then, the ministry of that dispensation, which, considered apart from the gospel, could only leave men under the sentence of death, spiritual, temporal, and eternal, was so glorious, and imparted such honor to Moses: how could it be supposed, that the ministry of the New Covenant, through which especially the life-giving sanctifying Spirit is given to sinners, as the seal and earnest of eternal life, should not be glorious, and honorable to those entrusted with it? (Marg. Ref. b.—Notes, John 4:10—15. 7:37—39.) If that ministry, which in itself tended only to condemnation, contained such a display of the divine glory, as rendered the exercise of it honorable; how should not that ministry, by which condemned sinners are taught the way of righteousness, through faith in Christ, and which contains so full and complete a discovery of the glory and harmony of God's perfections, confer far greater honor on the apostles, who were employed to preach it to the world? (Marg. Ref. d—f.) Indeed, the glory of the law, and of the legal dispensation, was so eclipsed by the glory of the gospel which immensely excelled it, as, in this respect, to be comparatively nothing: and after the publication of Christianity, the Mosaic dispensation lost all its reflected glory and divine authority, and became a lifeless letter and form, to those who rejected Christ. (Note, Gal. 4:8—11.) If then, that which was intended to be temporary, and at length to be abolished, had been glorious when Moses promulgated it; much more must the gospel, which was intended to continue till the end of the world, as the last and most complete discovery of the divine truth and will, be glorious in itself, and honorable to those who were entrusted to reveal it to mankind. (Marg. Ref. g, h.)—‘It should be understood, that the law,’ (of ten commandments,) ‘is not considered simply, but as connected with the ministry of Moses, ... and as apart and distinct from the gospel; in which respect, it may be said to have been abolished, when the ministration of Moses was abolished. But thou wilt say, is the ministration of Moses abolished in this respect? By no means: for men must always be prepared for the gospel, by the preaching of the law. But this I say, that the ministration of Moses is in all cases abolished, when the manifest grace of the gospel succeeds to the figurative preaching of the law.’ Beza. (Note, John 1:17.)—From this argument of the apostle, it is generally concluded, that the false teachers at Corinth judaised: but it has before appeared, that their leading errors were of a different nature; though some might be prone to run into that extreme. The apostle, however, seems to have principally intended “to magnify his office;” and to show from the example of Moses, that the ministry of the New Testament was honorable, in proportion to the superior glory of that dispensation: and that he, as immediately entrusted with the important stewardship of the divine mysteries, as an inspired apostle, and as faithful in this service, had a right to demand respect and deference to his authority; which his opponents, whoever they were, refused him, and instructed their followers to refuse him.

12 Seeing then that we have such hope, we use great * plainness of speech:

15 But even unto this day, when Moses is read, <sup>p</sup> the veil is upon their heart.

Note.—Having this hope and confidence, that he was made of God “an able minister” of that glorious dispensation, by which “the gift of righteousness,” and the “life-giving Spirit” were conferred on men; the apostle used great plainness, liberty, and boldness of speech: declaring without reserve “the whole counsel of God,” and faithfully reproving what was false and sinful, as one who had authority and sufficiency from God. His doctrine was not hid in obscurity, or ambiguity, or under types and shadows, as the legal dispensation had been; of which the veil on the face of Moses was a figure or emblem. (Marg. Ref. i, k.—Note, Ex. 35:29—35.) As this covering concealed the lustre of his countenance, so the obscurity of that dispensation concealed its real glory; and the Israelites were unable to look steadfastly to Christ, the great End, Scope, and Substance, of those ceremonies which were shortly to be abolished. (Marg. Ref. l, m.—Notes, Rom. 10:1—4. Col. 2:16,17. Heb. 9:1—14.) Even believers had only indistinct and transient glimpses of that glorious Object; (Note, 1 Pet. 1:10—12.) and unbelievers looked no further than the outward institution, except as they expected a temporal deliverer and King. Thus the minds of the Jews were generally blinded by pride, prejudice, and carnal lusts; which formed a veil over their hearts, in addition to that which was thrown over the Mosaic law: and this veil remained to close their minds against the truth, even after the light of the gospel had shown the real import of the legal ceremonies: so that, when the Jews read the Old Testament, the veil upon their hearts prevented them from understanding its true meaning, or deriving any spiritual benefit from it. For “the veil is done away only in Christ;” his doctrine removes it from the written word: but faith in him, and the teaching or illumination of the Spirit, must remove it from the mind and heart, and enable the believer to perceive the spiritual meaning of the types, prophecies, and promises of the whole scripture. For want of this, the Jews at that time, (and their awful case is the same to this day,) had “a veil on their hearts,” when the law of Moses was read among them; nor could all their diligence, attention, or attachment to the law, enable them to understand it in a saving manner. But when any individuals among them were converted to the Lord Jesus, this veil was removed from their minds: and this will be the case respecting the nation in general, when they shall, according as it is predicted by all the prophets, believe in their long rejected Messiah. 17 Now <sup>s</sup> the Lord is that Spirit: and <sup>t</sup> where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty.

Note.—The preceding argument shows, that the Lord Jesus "is that Spirit," or animating soul, which gives life to the letter of the scriptures, and to believers. (6) Without him, doctrines, promises, ordinances, and commandments, are a mere lifeless body of religion; the power and life of all and of every part must wholly be derived from their relation to his person, mediation, and grace: and, without faith in him and grace from him, all knowledge, ordinances, or external obedience, constitute only a "form of godliness." In both respects he is, as it were, the soul which animates the body, and gives activity, energy, and value to every part of it. This union with Christ is effected by the indwelling of his "Holy Spirit:" and where this divine Agent, 'proceeding from the Father and the Son,' and One with the Father and the Son, inhabits the heart, "there is liberty." He gives freedom from sin and Satan, from condemnation and slavish principles, from the love of the world and the fear of men: he renders the will free from the bondage of corrupt passions; he enables the believer to find liberty in willing obedience, and in spiritually worshipping God. (Marg. Ref. s, t.—Notes, Ps. 51:12,13. Rom. 8:1,2,14—17. 2 Tim. 1: 6—8.) And he gives him confidence and boldness in his conduct among men, without regarding their censures and frowns, or courting their friendship or applause; from conscious integrity and satisfaction of the Lord's acceptance. (Note, 1 John 5:4,5.) Thus all Christians, in proportion to their degree of faith and grace, being made alive to God, free from the slavery of sin, and enlightened by the Spirit of the Lord, "behold with open face, as in a mirror," by faith exercised on divine revelation, "the glory of God" in the Person and work of his Son. And this "glory," beaming upon their souls with transforming efficacy, (as opaque objects reflect the rays of the sun, and so become in a measure luminous;) they are gradually changed into his image of righteousness, purity, truth, and love; growing more and more like their beloved Saviour, in judgment, disposition, affections, and conduct, from one degree of this glorious holiness to another; even as by the work "of the Spirit of the Lord;" or "the Lord the Spirit," by which he new-creates the soul; and according to the measure, in which he discovers the glory of God in Christ, and enables a man to behold it with open face and fixed admiration: till at length the work will be perfected, when the view of faith, as in a mirror, shall be changed for immediate and perfect vision. (Marg. Ref. v—z.—Notes, 4:5,6. 1 John 3:1—3.) Some expositors explain the "open," or unveiled "face," to mean the face of Christ; rendering the words, "We all, in an unveiled face, beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, &c." The glory of God in the face of Christ is certainly the object contemplated. The veil on the face of Moses implied, that this glory was but obscurely shown by his ministration: but the veil, by the "ministration of righteousness and of the Spirit," is removed; so that the glory of God in the face of Christ is unveiled; and all they, from whose hearts the veil of prejudice, pride, unbelief, and worldly lusts, is taken away, see it clearly and distinctly. If the "unveiled face" be understood of the beholders, this latter "veil" is meant; and the contrast is between them and the unbelieving Jews: but if it be understood of Christ, then the contrast is between the obscure ministration of Moses, and the clear and full ministration of the apostles. As believers they beheld this glory: and through their doctrine, by the teaching of the Holy Spirit, all Christians did and still do behold it.—The holiness of God, as comprising all his moral perfections, in his "glory," and the renewal of our souls, from those sinful propensities which are our shame, to increasing degrees of conformity to the divine holiness, is transformation "from glory to glory," till perfected in heaven.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

and are highly gratified with it.—The conversion of sinners, and their subsequent holy lives, are the minister's best "letter of recommendation;" and if these effects be evident and abundant, he will generally want no other testimonial among real Christians. For his usefulness is manifestly declared, and fully understood, to be the attestation of Christ himself to his ministry; which attestation is written, by the Spirit of the living God, upon the hearts of his people, and made legible in their lives and actions.—They who profess and are zealous for the holy truths of the gospel should remember, that their tempers and conduct are supposed to exhibit the tendency and effect of that doctrine and ministry, which they approve and attend upon. Yet, alas! the prominent appearance of such religious profession is self-confidence, boasting, loquacity, censoriousness, a disputatious temper, bitterness, and clamor; with little strictness in the general conduct! "The epistle," thus exhibited to be "read and known of all men," often shows under what sort of a ministry it was formed; though it leaves the reader in great doubt, whether Christ had any part in it, or whether an enemy alone was concerned. (Notes, Matt. 13:24—30,36—43.) But many, who attend on the most faithful and practical preachers, exhibit such an epistle, (so to speak,) to the perusal of the church and of the world, as has evident marks of spuriousness: while numbers charge all the blame on the doctrine and ministry, which are thus disgraced. But when professed Christians act consistently, obeying the commands and copying the example of their Lord, they honor and recommend the gospel and the preachers of it; and are instrumental in bringing others also to attend on the truth without prejudice. (Notes, Matt. 5:13—16. Phil. 2:14—18. 1 Pet. 2:12. 3:1—4,13—16.)—Success in this blessed work should inspire our minds with confidence in God: yet we ought always humbly to recollect and acknowledge, that "we are not sufficient of ourselves to think any thing as of ourselves;" that our whole dependence must be on the Lord, both for endowments and success; and that the whole glory belongs to him alone.—It is a very great honor to be made "able ministers of the New Testament." We should not indeed suppose ourselves to be such, in that pre-eminent sense which the apostle meant: yet, by imbibing his principles, copying his example, and adhering to his doctrine, we may hope that the Lord will, in an inferior degree, qualify us for the same honorable service.—Even the New Testament will be "a killing letter," if exhibited as a mere system and form, without a dependence on the Spirit of God, to give it a quickening energy; yet it is by the blessed doctrine of God our Saviour alone, that the Spirit is given to sinful man: so that where this "light of life" does not shine, men remain dead in sin, and destitute of all that is 'good 'before God.'

V. 7—18.

The holy law of God, though excellent and glorious in itself, can only be "the ministration of death" and "condemnation" to fallen man: but justifying righteousness and sanctifying grace come from Jesus Christ alone, and by the ministry of the gospel. This gracious revelation so far "exceeds in glory" the holy law itself; that it even seems to eclipse it, as the noon-day sun does the glimmering stars: so far do the clear light and glory of the gospel exceed those of all preceding dispensations. May Christians then learn to value the faithful ministry of the gospel, and encourage their "preachers to use great plainness of speech," suited to the doctrine with which they are entrusted! and may all preachers study and endeavor after this great plainness and boldness of speech, in all their ministrations; before the rich and powerful, as well as among their poorer brethren! May we read the scriptures with continual prayer, to have the "veil removed from our hearts," that we may discover and "steadfastly behold" the Lord Jesus, as "the End of the law for righteousness to every believer;" that so we may profit even by those things which are now "abolished!" May we pray also in behalf of them, whose minds are still blinded by pride, prejudice, and unbelief; especially for the poor Jews, who are preserved a living demonstration of the truth of the scriptures, though themselves utterly unacquainted with their spiritual import! May they speedily be turned to the Lord, and "the veil be taken from their hearts!" and while we pray for a blessing on the designs lately formed for attempting their conversion, let us also aid them in every way, to the utmost of our power.—May we always remember, that the Lord Jesus is the Life and Soul, as it were, of the scriptures and of all true religion: that, being One with him, by faith and his in-dwelling Spirit, we enjoy true liberty in the service of God; and that "beholding with open face, as in a glass, the glory of the Lord, we are changed into his image, from glory to glory, as by the Lord the Spirit!" This transformation of the soul, into conformity to Christ, is the proper evidence and test of spiritual illumination; and without a measure of it, all supposed discoveries and revelations are mere delusion and enthusiasm. May then all, who are called ministers, have the eyes of their understanding enlightened, to behold in this manner the glorious Object of our faith, hope, love, and imitation; and point him out to others, with the same efficacy on their souls also: that so the triune JEHOVAH, Father, Son, and Spirit, may be glorified in all and by all, now and for evermore!

CHAP. IV.

The apostle declares his unwearied zeal and conscious integrity, in preaching the gospel, 1, 2. "The god of this world blinds the minds" of unbelievers, against the light of the divine glory of Christ; which God imparts, by shining into the hearts of his people, 3—6. The weakness and sufferings of the apostle redounded to the praise of the power of God, 7—12. He states the supports, motives, and prospects of glory, by which he and his helpers were induced to persevere without fainting, 13—18.

ing ourselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God.

Note.—The apostle, having had such a glorious and excellent ministry entrusted to him, as had been deserved; and being sensible of the abundant mercy which had been shown to him, in his extraordinary conversion and reconciliation unto God, and his call to the apostleship; did not faint, because of the dangers, difficulties, and sufferings, which he had to encounter: he neither disgracefully declined the service to which he was called; nor fainting sunk under it. (Marg. Ref. a—c.—Notes, 2: 14—17. 3:12—16. 1 Tim. 1:12—16.) But he and his fellow-laborers renounced with abhorrence all those artful contrivances, by which the priests of the idolaters, or the scribes and priests of the Jews, or corrupt teachers of Christianity, imposed on their followers: served their own dishonorable and dishonest purposes, or concealed their secret crimes. The true servants of Christ did not thus exercise their ministry; with "craftiness" or duplicity, professing one thing and aiming at another; and covering avarice and ambition, or sensual indulgence, under high pretensions to zeal and sanctity. Nor did they deceitfully model their doctrine, to suit the prejudices and inclinations of men, for their own selfish ends; by keeping back profitable truths, or making such additions and alterations, as might render their preaching less offensive; or by using ambiguous and obscure language, that their meaning might not be clearly apprehended. (Note, Acts 20:18—27.) On the contrary, they endeavored to set "the truth," as "the counsel of God," before their hearers, in the most manifest, convincing, and affecting light; that so, their doctrine, ministry, and conduct might be "commended to every man's conscience," even if his heart rose up against it; that every one might perceive the truth and importance of their message; and be sensible that both his interest and duty required him to attend to it: and this they did, as "in the sight of God," the ever present Witness and Judge of the "thoughts and intents of their hearts." (Marg. Ref. d—f.)—"What reason can be assigned why they, who ... preached the gospel plainly, should 'write the same things to the same persons obscurely? ... (Eph. 3:4. Phil. 3:1. 1 Pet. 1:13, '14. 3:1,2.)—"Whatsoever things were written of old time, were written for our learning:" (Rom. 15:4.) and surely they who 'wrote afterwards by the same Spirit, wrote for 'the same end, that they to whom they wrote 'might 'be wise to that which is good." (Rom. '16:19.)—And if they wrote for our learning 'and instruction, to be sure they wrote plainly 'and clearly as to them; since otherwise they 'wrote not so, as to instruct and teach, but 'rather to confound the reader. Seeing therefore the great end of writing the scripture was 'to instruct the world, in the will and mind of 'God, and the great things of the Christian 'faith;—their writings are an effectual means 'to obtain it; which yet they cannot be, unless 'they are plain and clear, as to the great things

'of religion.' Whitby. This was written against the papists, who discourage the reading of the scriptures, because they are obscure, lest the common people should learn heresy from them; and on the same ground they rest the claims of the church to infallibility, and the authority of their traditions. But the reasoning is equally conclusive against all those nominal protestants, who suppose that great learning and skill are needful to understand the scriptures, especially the apostolical epistles; otherwise conclusions may be drawn from them, which they think heretical; and this is a consideration which is become of very great importance, in the strange and anti-christian controversy of late excited even among protestant ministers and rulers of the church, about the propriety of circulating the holy scriptures alone among mankind in general!

3 But if our gospel be hid, it is hid to them that are lost:

4 In whom the god of this world hath blinded the minds of them which believe not, lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ, who is the Image of God, should shine unto them.

Note.—If then after all, the gospel, which the apostle preached so plainly, were "hidden," or "covered with a veil," as the Mosaic law had been; if its truth, nature, and glory were concealed from any who heard it; those persons were evidently as yet in a lost estate, and in the most imminent danger of final perdition; and the veil must be upon their hearts, through the prevalence of pride, prejudice, and ungodly lusts. (Marg. Ref. g, h.—Note, 3:12—16.) For Satan, "the god of this world," whom all unconverted men worship and serve in one way or other, prevailed to blind the understandings of numbers who heard the gospel, and disbelieved it through love of sin and pride of heart: that so the "illumination of the gospel of the glory of Christ," (Marg. Ref. k, l.) even the light which exhibits so clearly the glory of Christ, as "the Image of God," representing and displaying all divine perfections harmoniously exercised in the person, character, and salvation of Emmanuel, "might not shine unto them," or within them. (Note, Ps. 119:130.)—Immense multitudes of Satan's subjects are kept from hearing the gospel: others hear, and for a time are blinded by the tempter to oppose or reject it: (Note, Matt. 13:19.) and his grand design is, at any rate, or by any means, to keep out this transforming light; yet many, who for a season were blinded, have been at length converted. But among the number of unbelievers the enemy is permitted, in awful judgment, to blind many to their perdition: and this was peculiarly to be expected by those, who closed their eyes to this light, when apostles were the preachers, and their doctrine was confirmed by evident and multiplied miracles. (Marg. Ref. l-n.)—‘The fault is not in us, or in the obscurity of the gospel, but in their own blindness; for we hide nothing from them.’ Whitby.—It is astonishing that many of the ancient Christian writers understood the true God to be meant, by ‘the God of this world.’ (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Matt. 4:8—11. John 12:27—33. 14:29—31. 16:8—11. Acts 26:16—18. Eph. 6:10—13. Col. 1:9—14. 1 John 5:19.) But it is not said on what account this singular title, ‘the God of this world,’ was given him. Is he not the God of all worlds, of all ages, of all dispensations? And is he not in a more special sense, the God of those who are ‘delivered from this present evil world?’ (Gal. 1:4. Notes, John 15:17—21. 17:13—16.)—This shows also that the authority of the fathers, as expositors of scripture, is not implicitly to be depended on: and that the concessions of the first reformers in this respect greatly embarrassed their cause, in arguing against the papists.—Blinded. (4) *Notes, Ex. 4:21. 1 Kings 22:19—23. [Practical Observations.]

Note.—The peculiarity of the apostle’s ministry, and that of his faithful associates, was this: they ‘preached not themselves,’ they did not seek to exalt or enrich themselves; they did not aspire after authority, reputation, or any secular pre-eminence: and they preached ‘Christ Jesus,’ as their great Subject, in respect of his Person and salvation; and the great object of their preaching was to exalt and glorify him; they declared him to be ‘the Lord,’ the Lord of the church, and ‘the Lord of all;’ and they called on men to accept of his salvation, submit to his authority, and become his obedient servants. (Marg. Ref. o, p.—Note, Luke 2:9—14, v. 11.) But, as to ‘themselves,’ they were not only fellow-subjects of all Christians to their common Lord, but they were the willing servants of the church for Christ’s sake: they judged themselves to be bound by the strongest obligations, readily to labor, venture, suffer, and submit to the deepest debasement, in doing good to men; as far as the glory of Christ could be advanced by it, or his command required it. (Marg. Ref. q.—Notes, Matt. 20:24—28. 1 Cor. 9:19—23.) This zeal to glorify their beloved Lord made them earnest to be understood in their preaching; which ought to have recommended them to all Christians, in proportion as it excited the enmity and opposition of Satan and his servants. They were induced and enabled to act in this manner, by what they had themselves experienced; for they too might have been given up to be ‘blinded by the god of this world,’ and Paul especially was for a time in an awful state of opposition to the light of the glorious gospel: but at length, ‘that GOD who,’ in the creation of the world, ‘commanded light to shine out of darkness,’ (Note, Gen. 1:3—5.) had of his sovereign mercy effected a similar change in their souls, where ignorance, error, sin, and misery had before prevailed. By his new-creating Spirit he had removed all obstacles, and caused the light of divine truth to ‘shine into their hearts;’ having prepared the understanding to admit, and the heart to love, the doctrine of the gospel. Thus had he given them ‘the illumination of the knowledge of the glory of God,’ by faith receiving ‘the sure testimony of God,’ under the teaching of the Holy Spirit: they beheld his glory ‘in the face of Jesus Christ,’ in his person, miracles, character, righteousness, atonement, and mediation; which, being thus steadfastly beheld with open face, as in a mirror, transformed the soul into the glorious image of God exhibited in it. (Marg. Ref. r-u.—Note, 3:17,18.)—The apostle seems especially to have adverted to his own extraordinary conversion: yet he evidently meant to include the change wrought in the minds and hearts of all other faithful ministers and true believers; which is similar in its nature and effects, and effected by the same divine power, though not attended by the same miraculous circumstances.—‘The god of this world’ blinds men’s minds, lest the light of the gospel should make known to them ‘the glory of Christ;’ but God enlightens the minds of his chosen people, that they may ‘behold that glory;’ so that this seems the grand distinction between those whom Satan blinds, and those whom God the Spirit illuminates.—Face. (6) ‘The apostle continually alludes to the face of Moses, which was not uncovered, (that the image of God might be clear,) but covered.’

7 But we have <sup>x</sup> this treasure <sup>y</sup> in earthen vessels, <sup>z</sup> that the excellency of the power may be of God, and not of us.

Note.—(Notes, Eph. 3:8. Col. 2:1—4.) This treasure (even "the light of the knowledge of the glory of God, in the face of Christ," and that important ministry which related to it,) was, as it were, deposited in earthen vessels." (Marg. Ref. g.—Notes, Judg. 7:4—8,16—22.) Even the apostles and most eminent evangelists were sinners, by nature and practice; their bodies were frail and mortal, as those of other men; liable to the same infirmities, susceptible of pain and suffering, and easily worn down by fatigue and hardship, or pinched with hunger and cold; nor were their minds less susceptible of fear, sorrow, anxiety, and disquietude, than those of their brethren and neighbors. (Notes, Acts 14:11—18. v. 15. Jam. 5:16—18.) They were also conscious of many defects and impediments; and destitute of those accomplishments which the world generally admires: they had no wealth or authority; they made no show of superior genius, learning, or eloquence; nor were they delivered from the effects of indwelling sin. So far, therefore, from being such illustrious persons as to attract general admiration, they were treated as "the filth of the world;" (Notes, 8—12. 1 Cor. 4:9—13.) and, while their infirmities often rendered them less acceptable even to the churches; their stripes and imprisonments increased the contempt with which the proud and self-wise beheld them. This was appointed by God for most important purposes. He could have commissioned angels to proclaim the glorious doctrine of the gospel; or he could have put "this treasure" into more splendid "vessels," by sending the most eminent and admired of the sons of men to instruct the nations: but it was his plan to make it undeniably manifest, that the superior energy of the gospel, and the wonderful effects produced by it, were wholly owing to the "excellency of his power," as working by that doctrine; and not at all to be ascribed to the superior endowments of the persons whom he employed. (Marg. Ref. z.—Note, 1 Cor. 2:

3—5.) For this end he chose mean brittle vessels, by which to convey this treasure to mankind; that his power might be glorified in their preservation, and in the blessed change wrought in multitudes of the human race by their ministry.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—It was very suitable to the apostle's design, of re-establishing himself in the affections of his brethren at Corinth, to remind them of his sufferings and his supports in that ministry, from which they had received such unspeakable advantage. (Notes, 1:1—7. 6:3—10. 11:24—31. 1 Cor. 4:9—13.) He and other faithful ministers were "troubled on every side," in every place, from persons of every description, and with all kinds of afflictions: yet were they "not distressed," or straitened, as men who had no way of escape or relief. They were "perplexed" with difficulties, and doubted, as men without any counsellors, what course they should take, and how they should endure amidst such multiplied trials: yet they were not left to "despair" of help and comfort. They were "persecuted," wherever they went: yet the Lord did not forsake them, or permit their enemies to prevail against them. They were even "cast down," in the conflict with temptation and persecution: yet they "were not destroyed;" but were enabled to rise up again and to renew the fight, without any material damage to themselves or the cause. (Marg. Ref. a—e.—Note, Ps. 37:23,24.) Thus "they carried about with them" in their bodies "the dying of the Lord Jesus;" in those bruises, wounds, and stripes, which they received for his sake, and from such men as had crucified him: that so, "the life of Jesus," as risen and glorified, might be evidently proved by the protection, deliverances, supports, and consolations afforded to them: which enabled them to proceed with constancy and fortitude in their ministry, amidst complicated dangers and sufferings. (Marg. Ref. f, g.—Note, 13:1—4.) For while some of their brethren had sealed their testimony with their blood, those “who lived” were continually “delivered unto death,” in the persecutions which every where awaited them: that so the power of their ever-living Saviour might be manifested, in still preserving their mortal flesh, in life and fitness for service. (Marg. Ref. h, i.—Note, 1 Cor. 15:31—34.) Indeed death was, as it were, continually at work on the apostle and his helpers, by the hardships which they endured in conformity to the death of Christ: but life had been wrought in the souls of the Corinthians by means of their sufferings; as they were not only exempted from persecutions, but were made partakers of spiritual and eternal life by their ministry. And did it then become them, to augment the trials of their faithful pastors by neglect and disaffection?—“While you are called to live for ‘his honor, we may be said to serve our Redeemer, by bearing for his sake repeated ‘deaths.’ Doddridge.”

Note.—The apostle and his fellow-sufferers persevered in their ministry; because they were actuated by “the same spirit of faith,” which the Psalmist had expressed; when, amidst imminent dangers and distressing difficulties, he had declared his confidence, that God, according to his promise, would deliver him out of them all. (Marg. Ref. l—n.—Note, Ps. 116:10,11.)—They believed most firmly the doctrines which they preached; and therefore nothing could induce them to conceal, retract, or corrupt them. In the daily expectation and anticipation of martyrdom, they were fully assured, that God would raise their mangled bodies from the grave, by the power of Jesus, even as he had raised him from the dead: (Note, 5:1—4.) and that he would thus “present them,” with all those to whom their labors had been blessed, before his glorious throne, as the objects of his love, whom he at length had made perfect in glory and felicity. (Marg. Ref. o, p.—Notes, 11:1—6. Eph. 5:22—27. Jude 22—25.) They also fully understood, that all their sufferings, as well as their ministerial endowments, were intended to subserve the Lord’s purposes of love to their brethren; in order that the abundant mercy and grace vouchsafed to them might excite very large numbers to thank God, for the benefit received by their means; and thus conduce also to the display of his glory. (Marg. Ref. q, r. Note, 1:8—11.) With these prospects and hopes they were preserved from “fainting;” or declining the dangers and difficulties attending on their ministry. (Note, 1,2.) For, “though their outward man perished,” their bodies were worn out by fatigue and sufferings, and their lives destroyed by repeated violences; yet their “inward man,” or their souls as born of God, daily became stronger in faith, hope, love, and patience; and were renewed more and more into the holy image of God. (Marg. Ref. s—x.—Note, Ps. 73:23—28.) They therefore considered their various trials to be “light affliction,” which ought scarcely to be mentioned, being as nothing, when compared with the end they had in view: and the continuance of their sufferings, though for many years, was but for a moment when contrasted with eternity. (Note, Rom. 8:18—23.) Moreover they knew, by faith and experience, that these afflictions were working out for them an increase of future and eternal felicity: both as means, by which God made them “partakers of his holiness,” and rendered them more capable of spiritual enjoyment; and as he would graciously and abundantly recompense those sufferings which they endured for his sake. (Marg. Ref. z—b.—Notes, Rom. 5:3—5. Heb. 12:9—11. Jam. 1:2—4. 1 Pet. 4:12—16.)—The words here used are far more emphatical, than any translation of them can well be made. exact truth, in any animated description or narration: but in the subject on which the apostle spoke, the boldest figures of speech must come short of the mark. If a man proceeded from one apparent hyperbole to another, and accumulated the most energetic terms as much as possible, he could not fully express the superlative excellency of that glory, honor, and immortality, in which the believer's sufferings would assuredly terminate. Compared with it, all temporal afflictions were levity itself, "a momentary lightness of affliction;" and earthly prosperity mere vanity and emptiness. This glory was substantial, weighty, durable, exceeding description and imagination; and human language must labor in vain to convey any suitable ideas of it. It would even have been an insupportable "weight" to them, until their bodies and souls were prepared by Omnipotence to sustain it. It was "a weight of glory," a fulness of God; a measure of knowledge, holiness, dignity, and felicity, in his favor, and presence, and according to his glorious excellency and beauty; adequate to whatever they should be made capable of possessing and enjoying: and all this would be unchangeable and eternal.—In this prospect the apostle and his brethren disregarded visible and sensible objects; they did not aim at worldly honors and advantages; they looked not at them with estimation or desire, as the objects which they aimed to appropriate; but by faith they beheld, and in hope they sought, invisible glories as their great object: being assured, that all visible and sensible things, whether pleasant or painful, the good or the evil things of the world, were temporal, or temporary, and would speedily be terminated; whereas the unseen objects which faith realized, were eternal; whether the final happiness of believers, or the final misery of the wicked were considered; and this gave such an incomparable importance in their judgment to unseen things, that nothing else seemed worthy of their desires, or of their fears. (Marg. Ref. c. d.)—"What an influence St. Paul's Hebrew had upon his Greek 'is every where visible. Cabad in Hebrew 'signifies to be heavy, and to be glorious. ... St. Paul in the Greek joins them, and says, "weight of glory." Locke.—That the writers of the New Testament frequently hebraize, so to speak, is manifest: but whether this might not in some cases be intentional, may be questioned. Even the copious Greek, as found in the most admired pagan writers, could not have expressed, in full energy, many of the apostle's exalted conceptions; without some of those sublime allusions and metaphors, which are found only in the Hebrew scriptures, or in the New Testament exclusively.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

They are not proper persons for the sacred ministry of "the New Testament," who do not expect the salvation of their own souls from the free mercy of God through Jesus Christ. If we have thus "received mercy," or have a prevailing hope of it; we should not "faint" under any tribulations, while employed to recommend it to our fellow-sinners. Indeed divine grace will teach faithful ministers, "to renounce the hidden things of dishonesty, and shame;" they will not "walk in craftiness, nor handle the word of God deceitfully;" and if any, who are artfully imposing on men for their own credit or profit, suppose themselves partakers of the saving mercy of Christ, they are as much deceived by Satan, as others can be by them. For the consistent minister of the gospel avoids all duplicity, and all appearances of it; he neither pays court to any man's passions, nor connives at his vices: but endeavors in the most perspicuous and intelligible manner, to declare, and with convincing energy apply the truth, and thus "to commend himself to every man's conscience in the sight of God;" that even, if his heart fight against the truth, his conscience may take the part of the preacher against himself.—If the gospel, when thus preached, "be hidden" from the hearers; it is evident, that they are still in the way of destruction: and they have reason to dread the consequences of their obstinate unbelief; as it is among persons of this description especially, that Satan, the usurping "god of this world," is permitted to blind and harden numbers to their everlasting ruin. It is his great object to retain men in the dark; particularly to keep out of their minds, "the light of the gospel of the glory of Christ;" he therefore spares no pains to drive them to a distance from faithful preaching, or by various prejudices to set them against it; or by manifold corruptions to substitute an inefficient or pernicious doctrine in the place of it. His grand opposition is always made to the personal and mediatorial glory of Christ: for he knows, that no other knowledge, or religious observances, will sanctify, or save those, on whom this divine "light doth not shine;" and that none can perish who are illuminated by it.—But, though many "are blinded," the minister must go on with his work: he must not preach himself, either as the subject or the object of his instructions; but he must "preach Christ Jesus the Lord;" dwelling on his love and salvation as his favorite theme, and seeking his glory as the great end of his labors: and, instead of aspiring to pre-eminence and authority, he should willingly be "the servant" of the disciples of Christ, nay of all men, for his sake, and stoop to any thing which may promote their good. (Note, Gal. 5:13—15.) Indeed, this will be the disposition of all those, into whose hearts "God hath shined" by his new-creating Spirit, to "give them the light of his glory, in the face of Jesus Christ." In proportion to the degree of our spiritual illumination, we shall reflect the image of Christ, even as he is to us "the Image of the invisible God;" and we shall learn lowliness, self-denial, and love from that admired pattern. But without this illumination, the soul remains a dark, confused, and deformed chaos, when genius and science have done their utmost: nor can that knowledge of God and of Christ, "which is eternal life," be obtained in any other way. (Notes, Matt. 11:27. John 17:1-3. 1 John 2:3-6. 2 John 7-11.)

V. 7-12.

The Lord puts the treasure of heavenly truth into mean earthen vessels. He often employs persons of infirm bodies, moderate abilities, or low rank in society, even such as worldly policy would reject and despise: for, whatever instrument be selected, he will make it appear, that the "excellency of the power," by which the gospel is made successful, is of "God, and not of men." (P. O. 1 Cor. 2:1-9.) He therefore uses various methods to convince his most useful servants of their own weakness and insufficiency; and sometimes he makes their infirmities visible to others, that they may not give them undue honor and respect. (Note, 12:7-10. P. O. 1-10.) These earthen pitchers are very brittle: but the rich treasure, which they contain, is often made peculiarly manifest when they are most exposed; and when they are broken to pieces, it is sometimes more abundantly communicated, than it was before. (P. O. Judg. 7:16-25.)—In one way or other, both Christians and ministers must be troubled; and sometimes it will be "on every side." Yet faith and grace will preserve them from deep distress. They may be "perplexed" by various difficulties and complicated discouragements: yet they will be preserved from utter "despair;" the Lord will not forsake them in their persecutions and temptations. Even when cast down by their enemies, they shall not be destroyed; for he will lift them up again, and enable them to renew the combat. But the troubles and sins of ungodly men, as well as their temporal prosperity, will terminate in everlasting darkness and despair. It is indeed a great honor, though painful to nature, "always to bear about with us the dying of the Lord Jesus," by suffering for his sake, and after his example, from the contempt and enmity of this evil world: and he will show his life and power, by supporting and comforting those, who are thus tried and exposed in his cause. (Note, Matt. 5:10-12.) Indeed, if we by faith are interested in our dying Redeemer, and conformed to him in outward troubles, and the crucifixion of the flesh; we shall, in hope, comfort, holiness of life, and constancy in his service, abundantly manifest his power and truth, as risen and glorified: and, as far as we resemble him, we shall be willing and thankful for "death to work in us," that life may be given to others by our means; and that many may be induced to live to the glory of God, when our course is terminated, and our warfare accomplished.

V. 13-18.

Nothing can be done in the spiritual warfare in which we are engaged, without the "same spirit of faith," which animated the ancient prophets, apostles, and martyrs of Jesus: we shall be timid, hesitating, and wavering in our testimony, unless we can firmly say, "I believed, and therefore have I spoken." But when we are fully assured of the truth, importance, and excellency of the gospel; nothing can durably prevail with us to retract, alter, or conceal the great doctrines, which we are called to preach or profess. Yet true religion does not require us to neglect our real interest. It assures us, that "he who raised up the Lord Jesus will also raise up" all his faithful followers, and present them before the assembled world, as those, who have honored him and whom he will honor. Knowing, therefore, "that all things work together for good to those who love God;" giving diligence to obtain the assurance that we are of this number; and being animated by the hope, that our labors and trials will conduce to the benefit of our brethren, and to the glory of the Lord; we shall not faint in our work and warfare. Even when our bodies waste away by disease, wear out by labor, grow feeble through old age, or are about to perish by persecution and death; the soul may be renewed and grow more vigorous and holy "day by day," and more ripe for the enjoyment of heavenly felicity.—But if the apostle could call his heavy and long-continued trials, "light affliction, and but for a moment;" what must our trifling difficulties appear in the estimate of faith and grace? How shameful then is it, that we should complain or despond under them! What powerful supports and consolations must there be in the hope and earnestness of heaven, beyond what we have hitherto experienced! May we then seek to have all our "light and momentary afflictions" sanctified to us; that, by promoting our humility, spirituality, and admiring love of God our Saviour, they may "work for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory!" We know not indeed what we shall be; but the unutterable nature of the felicity, which we are encouraged to expect, should enhance our value for it. That must be little, which human language can express, or human imagination conceive; but the joys of heaven will be immense and everlasting. (Note, 1 John 3:1-3.) On the other hand, what must be the weight of that misery reserved for the wicked, concerning which the scriptures use the most energetic language; when all the sufferings, which a man is here exposed to, are light and momentary, according to the judgment of the inspired writers! Let us then "look off from the things which are seen;" let us cease to seek for worldly advantages, or to fear present distresses; let us take warning "to flee from the wrath to come," and give diligence to ensure future felicity; for "the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal."

CHAP. V.

The apostle declares, that the assured hope and earnest desire of being present with the Lord, when absent from the body, rendered him indifferent as to this life, 1-8: that he labored to approve himself to Christ, in the prospect of a future judgment, 9, 10: "knowing the terror of the Lord," he conscientiously persuaded men, 11: that he said this, not as boasting, but to furnish the Corinthians with an answer to false pretenders, 12: that the love of Christ constrained him to live no longer to himself, but to Christ; and made him dead to all other regards, 13-16: that all who are in Christ are new creatures, 17: that God, in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself, had reconciled him and other faithful preachers, and had "committed to them the ministry of reconciliation," 18, 19: and that as ambassadors, they, in the stead of Christ, ought to be reconciled to God, through his righteousness and atonement, 20, 21

2 For in this <sup>f</sup> we groan, <sup>g</sup> earnestly desiring to be <sup>h</sup> clothed upon with our house which is from heaven:

3 If so be that <sup>i</sup> being clothed we shall not be found naked.

4 For <sup>k</sup> we that are in this tabernacle <sup>l</sup> do groan, being burdened: not for that we would be unclothed, <sup>m</sup> but clothed upon, <sup>n</sup> that mortality might be swallowed up of life.

Note.—The apostle, continuing the argument of the preceding chapter, stated that he, and other faithful ministers, steadfastly endured persecution, in the assurance of a far happier state, whenever they should be cut off by death. (Note, 4:13—18.) The body might be regarded as “an earthly house,” in which the soul dwelt on earth, and which must soon “return to the dust whence it was taken:” yet it was “a tabernacle,” the unsettled and precarious abode of a few days, rather than a stated residence. (Marg. Ref. a, b.—Notes, 4:7. Gen. 2:7. 3:17—19. Job 4:17—19. 10:8—13. 2 Pet. 1:12—15.) This “house,” or “tabernacle,” was about to be taken down, and the materials of it to be “dissolved:” but when that change should take place, the soul being removed from a mean mouldering tenement, which continually needed repairs, and was a constant source of trouble, sorrow, temptation, and sin; would immediately have “a building of God,” a habitation far superior to all which ever were made with hands, a blessed mansion in the heavens, where God displays his glorious presence, and where light, purity, and felicity are found in full perfection: and this mansion would continue to all eternity. (Marg. Ref. c—e.—Notes, John 14:2,3. Heb. 11:8—10,13—16.)—As the apostle spoke of what was to follow immediately upon the dissolution of the body by death, he must be supposed to mean the state of the immortal soul, before as well as after the resurrection; for the language is figurative, and must not be confined by too literal an interpretation.—In this prospect, he and his brethren “groaned, earnestly desiring” to be delivered from their present troubles, and to be clothed with that glory, felicity, and immortality, which might be considered as the garment, as well as the mansion, of the blessed inhabitants of heaven. (Marg. Ref. f, g.—Notes, Phil. 1:21—26.) This he seems to have longed for, and desired to possess, without passing through death, if it might have been so. He, however, knew that as they should be at length thus arrayed, they would not be “found naked” or destitute, when they left this world, and all its possessions and accommodations; nor would they experience trouble, want, shame, or any inconvenience for evermore. (Marg. Ref. h, i.) This then must be a most desirable change: for while they were in the frail tabernacle of the body, they “groaned, being burdened” with manifold trials, temptations, and difficulties, from which they longed to be released. (Notes, Rom. 7:22—25. 8:18—23.) Not that they desired to be “unclothed,” by putting off the body at death, merely in order to be rid of its incumbrance. The prospect of that dissolution was not in itself pleasing to them; but they would rather be “clothed upon,” by being taken immediately to heaven, as Enoch and Elijah had been, “that mortality might” at once “be swallowed up,” and lost in life and immortality: yet the prospect of the consequences of death, and the hope of a future resurrection, reconciled them even to the pangs of the separating stroke. (Marg. Ref. m, n.—Notes, Gen. 5:21—24. P. O. 21—32. 2 Kings 2:11,13. Is. 25:6—8. 1 Cor. 15:50—54.)—The passage, being expressed in metaphors unusually bold, is indeed rather difficult; yet the above seems the evident meaning of it. Nor does it appear, that the apostle intended to express any expectation that the day of judgment and the general resurrection were at hand: or to determine any thing concerning the manner, as to external circumstances, in which the soul subsists, either before or after that solemn season.—The word “naked,” may allude to Adam and Eve, after they had eaten the forbidden fruit, and lost the robe of innocence: whereas believers, being “made the righteousness of God in Christ,” will not be thus “found naked,” in whatever manner they leave this world. 8 We are confident, I say, <sup>t</sup> and willing rather to be absent from the body, and to be <sup>u</sup> present with the Lord.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—That change of judgment and affections, by which the apostle and his brethren had been “wrought,” or fashioned, into a fitness for their perilous and suffering employments, and to a willingness to die for Christ’s sake, in the assurance of going to enjoy felicity in his favor, was the work of God himself, and could have been effected by no other agent. (Marg. Ref. o.—Notes, Rom. 9:22,23. Col. 1:9—14.)—This is an express testimony to the Deity of the Holy Spirit, by whom we are sanctified.—They had also received “the earnest of the Spirit,” in his sacred joys and consolations; so that they could not possibly be deceived in this respect. (Marg. Ref. p.—Note, 1:21,22.) They were therefore “always confident” of the divine favor, and courageous in their labors and efforts, though exposed to the daily peril of a violent death: as they well knew that, while they “sojourned” in the body, they must be excluded from the immediate presence of the Lord Jesus, as pilgrims in a distant land. For they then lived and labored by faith in him, as invisibly present with them, and taking care of them; which afforded them support and encouragement suited to the present state: yet it differed very much indeed from that intuitive vision of his glory and felicity, in his immediate presence, which was the object of their hopes and desires. (Marg. Ref. q—s.—Notes, 1:23, 24. 4:13—18. Rom. 8:24—27. Heb. 11:1,2,27. 12:2,3.) This “faith,” however, inspired them with confidence and courage; as they were fully assured that, whenever their bodies should be worn out by labors, or endure martyrdom, their souls, being dislodged from that tenement, would immediately be admitted into the presence of their beloved Lord.—This is absolutely decisive, concerning the felicity to be enjoyed by the souls of believers when “absent from the body:” and it also shows that they will possess their happiness in the very place, where Jesus displays his glorious presence.—The words “at home” (6) seem not well chosen. This world is not the believer’s home, but the place of sojourning and pilgrimage; and his body is the tabernacle in which he sojourns. “Those that dwell in the body are at a distance ‘from the Lord; and those who have travelled ‘out of the body, ... reside, or are at present, ‘with the Lord.’ Campbell.

9 Wherefore <sup>x</sup> we * labor, that <sup>y</sup> whether present or absent, we may be <sup>z</sup> accepted of him.

10 For <sup>a</sup> we must all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ; that every one may <sup>b</sup> receive the things done <sup>c</sup> in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad.

11 Knowing therefore <sup>d</sup> the terror of the Lord, <sup>e</sup> we persuade men; <sup>f</sup> but we are made manifest unto God; and I trust also are made manifest in your consciences.

12 For <sup>g</sup> we commend not ourselves again unto you, but <sup>h</sup> give you occasion to glory on our behalf, that ye may have somewhat to answer them which glory in † appearance, and not in heart.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—In this hope, the apostle and his fellow-laborers were “ambitious.” ‘It is flat to ‘translate it, “We labor.”’ Doddridge.—They were ambitious, not of the honors and applause of the world, but of acceptance with the Lord, in respect of their persons, ministerial labors, and general conduct; though they should be unacceptable to mankind, or even to their brethren: that so, they might be supported, by the comforts and consciousness of his approbation, during their sojourning in the body, while “absent from him;” and that, when they should quit the body, they might be welcomed by him as good and faithful servants, and be admitted to “the joy of their Lord.” (Marg. Ref. x—z.—Notes, Matt. 25:19—23. Acts 20:22,24.) For they were assured, that both they and their hearers, and every man without exception, of every age and of all nations, “must” necessarily, whether they would or not, “appear,” or be “made manifest, in the whole of their true characters, with all the secrets of their hearts and lives, before the solemn and decisive “tribunal” of Christ, the righteous, impartial, holy, heart-searching, omnipotent Judge; who now called on them to trust in him and obey him as a divine Saviour, but who would surely take vengeance on all, who rejected or abused his salvation. (Marg. Ref. a—c.—Notes, Matt. 25:31—46. John 5:20—23,28,29. Acts 17:30, 31. Rom. 2:12—16. 14:10—12. 1 Cor. 4:3—5. 2 Thes. 1:5—10. Rev. 20:11—15.) At this solemn period, every individual will “receive” the appointed recompense of his deeds, according to the things done while he sojourned in the body, or done by the body, “whether they were good or evil;” without any respect of persons, or regard to profession, or other distinctions. So that the justified believer, who from love to Christ has done good, uprightly and faithfully, will receive an abundant and gracious recompense of his believing, though imperfect services: all his sins, and the defects and defilements of his services, being washed away by the blood of Christ. But the profligate, the infidel, the Pharisee, the hypocrite, the apostate, with all kinds of impenitent transgressors, will be punished according to the number and aggravation of their crimes, as evil only, in the sight of God, had been done by them. "Knowing" therefore "the terror of the Lord," what terrible vengeance the Lord would then execute on the workers of iniquity, the apostle and his brethren used every kind of argument and persuasion, to induce men, of all nations and descriptions, to believe in the Lord Jesus, and to act consistently with the character of his disciples. In this their earnest endeavor, the motives and intentions of their hearts had already been manifested to God, and judged by him; and they were confident of his gracious approbation: and, whatever the prejudices and passions of some at Corinth might suggest, the apostle was confident, that in general they were convinced in their consciences, that he and his helpers acted with integrity, zeal, and faithful affection to their souls. Not that they needed or intended again "to commend themselves" to favor, as if this appeal to God and their consciences, as well as some previous protestations, arose from selfish or vain-glorious motives. (Note, 3:1—3.) But they thus suggested such things, as were proper to be opposed to the censures and suspicions of false teachers; and gave the people occasion to glory in the disinterested labors and patient sufferings of their faithful ministers. Thus they might answer the boastings of those ambitious men, who gloried in appearance, as if very zealous in the cause of Christ, and greatly attached to his disciples at Corinth; but who were not really what they professed to be, and whose hearts entirely dissented from the language of their mouths.

15 And <sup>s</sup> that he died for all, <sup>t</sup> that they

which live should not ' henceforth " live unto themselves, but unto him which died for them, and rose again.

Note.—The great earnestness of the apostle to rectify the disorders at Corinth, and to re-establish his authority among them; his lively affections, and his excessive unrecompensed labors amidst sufferings and dangers, gave his adversaries occasion to represent him as "beside himself," and transported by a vehement zeal beyond all the dictates of reason and sobriety. (Marg. Ref. i.—Notes, 11:1—6, 16—20. 2 Kings 9:11. Jer. 29:24—32. Hos. 9:7, 8. Mark 3:20, 21. John 10:19—21. Acts 26:24—29.) But, whatever in his conduct had given them this opinion of him, it was wholly owing to his zeal for the honor of God and the gospel, and to his earnest desire to approve himself faithful. (Note, 2 Sam. 6:21—23.) And when at other times he seemed to act with great moderation and candor, and to debate matters with much coolness and sobriety; it was wholly from a regard to their welfare, and a desire to recover them from dangerous errors, in order to which he employed every method which he could devise, without regarding their censures, or any personal consequences. (Marg. Ref. l, m.) For in this, as well as in other things, "the love of Christ constrained him" and other faithful ministers and real Christians. The love which Jesus had manifested towards sinners in the great work of redemption, and to believers in calling them to partake of this inestimable blessing, had excited in their hearts such reciprocal admiring love and adoring gratitude to him, as "constrained them" and carried them on with invincible energy in every service, by which they could glorify his name or promote his cause: nor could any fears, hopes, affections, or interests stop their progress, when actuated by this most powerful principle. (Marg. Ref. n—q.) This, however, was no irrational or enthusiastical impulse, but the result of sober deliberate judgment. (Note, Phil. 1:9—11, v. 9.) For in this matter, they judged decidedly, in their most cool and reflecting moments, that if Jesus died as an atoning Sacrifice for all, "then were all dead," as under condemnation, enslaved to sin, and utterly destitute of power to deliver themselves: otherwise he needed not to die for them, or in their stead. "And that he died" as a common sacrifice for the sins of all men, or men of every nation and description; that when, through the preaching of his gospel to sinners, any were quickened and pardoned, and so "passed from death to life," they should, from that memorable period, no longer live according to their own inclinations, or seek their own interest, reputation, indulgence, or advancement, as they had formerly done; but should devote themselves, their bodies and souls, with all their possessions and talents of every kind, to do the will of the Redeemer, to 16 Wherefore henceforth <sup>x</sup> know we no man after the flesh: yea, though we have known Christ after the flesh, <sup>y</sup> yet now henceforth know we him no more.

Note.—The apostle and his fellow-laborers, therefore, being under such immense obligations, influenced by such strong motives, and encouraged by such animating hopes, and assurances of assistance, as had been stated; were powerfully impelled to disregard all contrary and interfering objects, that they might show their love to their most gracious Lord and Saviour. So that, these principles having been matured in them, they "knew no man after the flesh;" they had no respect to men's persons, because of nation, sect, rank, or personal attachment, when their obedience to Christ was concerned: they could not accommodate their doctrine or conduct to the humors of men, from any worldly principles, or because of outward connexions with them, or obligations to them. Nay, they did not now regard their external relation to Christ himself, as being of the same nation with him, or otherwise acquainted with him. Even such of the apostles and evangelists, as had personally known him, or been nearly related to him, did in this respect disregard that external tie; when it came in competition with their union with him as believers, and their obedience to him as his servants and ministers. They could not warp their doctrine, or deviate from their instructions, to please the Jews, or the nearest relatives of Christ; any more, than out of respect to their own friends, or to the philosophers, or the princes of the Gentiles. (Marg. Ref. x, y.—Notes, Deut. 33:9. Matt. 12:46—50. Mark 3:31—35. Luke 11:27,28. 1 Tim. 5:21,22.)—Many suppose that the apostle here referred to the Jewish converts, who were displeased with him for admitting the Gentiles into the church, and being earnest for their conversion, which they deemed a kind of madness (13): but the Christians at Corinth were chiefly Gentile converts, and they do not seem to have been generally disposed to Judaize.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The judgment, experience, and principles, which the apostle had stated, should not be regarded as peculiar to him or his friends, but as the standard of genuine Christianity: therefore, "if any man," whether Jew or Gentile, was "in Christ," as a justified believer, he was also "a new creature," or a new creation of God. (Marg. Ref. v.—Notes, Rom. 8:1, 2. 1 Cor. 1:26—31. Ps. 51:10. Gal. 6:15,16. Eph. 2:4—10.) By spiritual illumination, and its invariable effects, a new judgment had been produced, with new inclinations, new affections, and purposes; from which new words and actions must proceed. Thus, old desires, intentions, expectations, connections, and satisfactions "passed away," and were superseded; for, "behold," by the marvellous operation of divine grace, "all things were become new!" (Notes, Rev. 21:1—8.) So that the Christian experienced new hopes and fears, joys and sorrows, desires and aversions; he learned to speak a new language, to choose new companions, to act from new motives, to aim at new objects, and to attend to new employments. Every thing was now cast into a new mould, received a new impression, and took a new direction, from the knowledge of God, from faith in Christ and love to him; from humiliation for sin, and hatred of it; and from the desire of holiness, and the hope of eternal life. (*Marg. Ref. a, b.—Notes, Ez. 11:17—20. 18:30—32. 36:25—27. John 3:3—8. us, <sup>p</sup> who knew no sin; that <sup>q</sup> we might be made the righteousness of God in him.

Note.—As the change above described had been wrought by the power and according to the purpose of God; so it bore on it the stamp of his holy image, and led to a proper state of mind, heart, and conduct towards him. Thus “he had reconciled” the apostle and his brethren “to himself by Jesus Christ,” the great Mediator. (Marg. Ref. c, d.—Notes, Rom. 5: 1,2,7—11. Eph. 2:11—18. Col. 1:18—23.) And, having pardoned their rebellions, subdued their enmity, and “shed abroad his love in their hearts;” he had entrusted to them “the ministry of reconciliation;” that, from adoring love and gratitude to him, zeal for his glory, and benevolence to their fellow-sinners, they might spend their future lives in earnest and unwearyed endeavors to bring their fellow-sinners, “the enemies of God,” to partake of the same mercy, and to devote themselves in love to the service of their reconciled God. This ministry implied that “God was in Christ,” “manifested in the flesh.” (Marg. Ref. e, f.)—“The fulness of the Deity dwelt in and was displayed by the human nature, through the incarnation of the eternal Word and Son of God, as One with the Father: that so, being one with man in human nature, he might “reconcile the world unto himself,” by his atonement, mediation, and grace; and that sinners throughout the earth, of every nation and description, might thus be encouraged to hope in his mercy, and taught by his grace to love his holy perfections, law, worship, and service, to which their carnal minds had before been enmity. (Marg. Ref. h.—Notes, Rom. 5:6—10. 8:5—9.) When therefore sinners were brought to God, as “in Christ reconciling the world to himself,” in humble faith; he no more “imputed their trespasses unto them,” but blotted them out by a free forgiveness. (Marg. Ref. h.—Notes, Ps. 32:1,2. Rom. 4:6—8.) This “word of reconciliation” he had committed to those, who once were enemies, but who had been reconciled. So that they were now commissioned, as “ambassadors for Christ,” to go in his name, and by his authority, and declare these encouraging truths to sinners in every part of the world. And they were instructed, not only to command them to repent and believe the gospel, and to exhort, persuade, and encourage them to hope in the rich mercy of God through Jesus Christ; but also to declare, that “God did beseech men by them,” as the ambassadors of Christ; and they, “in Christ’s stead,” most earnestly entreated men, not to reject such astonishing love; but to repent, submit to God, accept his salvation, and be reconciled to him, as his worshippers, friends, and children. (Marg. Ref. i—n.) For it must be certain, that he was entirely willing to be thus reconciled to all, who accepted this invitation: seeing that “He,” even God the Father, “had made Him,” his incarnate Son, “who knew no sin,” but was most perfectly holy and righteous, “to be Sin,” or a Sin-offering, “for us,” who deserved the utmost severity of his vengeance. So that this holy and divine Saviour, being perfectly willing to suffer as a sacrifice, was dealt with as if he had been altogether a sinner: that thus God’s abhorrence of sin, and his determination to punish it, being so wonderfully displayed, he might honorably pardon and justify every believer, as “became the righteousness of God in Christ:” dealing with him as if he had been perfectly righteous, or “righteousness” itself; yea, “the righteousness of God in Christ:” for a far nobler, and more excellent righteousness was thus made his, by the gift of God, for justification, than any mere creature could ever have performed. (Marg. Ref. o—q.—Notes, Is. 45: 20—25. 53:4—12. Jer. 23:5,6. Dan. 9:24. Rom. 1:17. 3:21—26. 1 Cor. 1:26—31, v. 30. Gal. 3:6—14. Phil. 3:8—11.)—This verse contains most conclusive arguments, in proof of the vicarious sufferings of Christ, as the satisfactory atonement to divine justice for our sins; of the imputation of his perfect righteousness to believers, as their title to eternal life; and of his real Deity, whose righteousness becomes theirs for justification, by virtue of their union with him. Perhaps stronger language cannot be used, in declaring these doctrines, by those who most zealously contend for them.—The preposition here used, is translated “instead,” in the preceding verse: “in Christ’s stead,” or instead of Christ. Thus he suffered instead of us. (1 Pet. 3:18. Gr.)—The apostle doubtless spoke primarily of himself, and his fellow-laborers, as “the ambassadors of Christ;” yet, as all faithful ministers are entrusted with the same message, by the same authority, so they too are ambassadors, or envoys and messengers for Christ, though to a smaller number of their fellow-sinners.—Some of the professed Christians at Corinth were supposed by Paul to be unconverted, and unreconciled to God; and he might have them in view, when he spake of God’s beseeching sinners by his ministers. But he was evidently giving an account of his commission and general ministry, through the nations of the earth: wherever he came, he addressed sinners in this pathetic and earnest manner; and while “he prayed them in Christ’s stead to be reconciled to God,” it was as if God himself had besought them to lay aside their enmity, and accept of his mercy.—The change of the language, “ambassadors for CHRIST,” “God beseeches you; we pray you in CHRIST’S stead, &c.” shows how familiar it was to the apostle to consider his divine Lord and Master, as One with the Father, in Deity and authority.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

It is most animating for us to "know," amidst our sufferings, temptations, conflicts, and perils of death, that whenever we die we shall enter into the heavens, and be admitted to an unspeakable felicity: and this evidently may be known, with such certainty, as to produce habitual courage and confidence, even in the greatest dangers and most evident approaches of death, in its most formidable appearances: but our assurance or prevailing hope of this, must be proportioned to the evidence of our conversion.—It is not worth while to be solicitous about this clay-cottage, or tent, in which the soul is now incommodiously lodged, or rather imprisoned because of transgression. We should not then be troubled to feel it, as it were, shake, or to perceive the tokens of its approaching dissolution. We must not expect ease or satisfaction, in "this earthly house of our tabernacle;" but we should look forward in hopes of "a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." While "we groan," earnestly desiring admission into this blessed mansion; let us seek to be more and more "clothed upon" with the robes of righteousness and salvation: thus we may be sure, that we shall not "be found naked," when dislodged from the body. If in the mean time we "groan, being burdened" with manifold tribulations and temptations; or if we feel a reluctance to be stripped by the cold rude hand of death, and would rather choose to pass to heaven some other way, "that mortality might be swallowed up of life;" it may encourage us to recollect, that even apostles experienced the same troubles and conflicts, and knew something of the same reluctance. But if the desire of having done with sin and sorrow, and especially of beholding face to face our beloved Redeemer, has given us, in a measure, a victory over our fears, and made us willing, even "to be absent from the body, that we may be present with the Lord;" we should remember that it is God himself, who hath wrought our hearts into this spiritual and holy disposition; and that these desires and affections are indeed "the earnest of the Spirit," and first-fruits of our eternal happiness. This should excite us to an unremitted courage and confidence in our duty, whatever dangers may obstruct our course. While "absent from the Lord," we may by faith walk with him, and derive support and consolation from him; for thus we may "see him who is invisible," and realize those objects which are unseen: and whatever hastens our departure from the body, shortens also our passage to the presence of our Lord, where is fullness of joy for evermore.

V. 9—12.

While others labor for worldly riches, or are ambitious of "the honor that cometh from man," let us aspire after the glory of being accepted by Christ, in all our services during life, and of being received into his joy when we leave the world. As "we must all appear" without disguise before his judgment-seat, let us beware of hypocrisy, and be impartial in judging ourselves: and especially let us carefully acquaint ourselves with him as our Saviour, who will shortly be manifested as our Judge; that by his grace we may henceforth do those good things, which he will recompense, as the fruits and evidences of faith and love, in that decisive day. At present we may "choose whom we will serve," and what we will do: but, as we must die, so we must stand in judgment; and no more choice will be left us than is left to the criminal, whether he will or will not, be tried, condemned, or punished for his crimes. The expectation of this solemn time of righteous retribution should render all men earnest and diligent, in "working out their own salvation with fear and trembling;" lest any "should seem to come short of it:" but especially it should excite ministers to be unwearied and faithful in their work: and, knowing what a tremendous day it will be to all the workers of iniquity, they should be the more earnest and affectionate, in their persuasions and warnings to sinners, to seek salvation before it be too late. Happy are they, who are warranted to appeal to God, in respect of their faithfulness and zeal in this good work; and even to the consciences of those who are offended with their plain-dealing. This may sometimes be necessary, though men may censure it as "self commendation;" and it is often useful to suggest to the people such things, as are proper to be spoken, in defence of the truth and in behalf of faithful preachers; that they may know how to answer the cavils and boastings of "such, as glory in appearance," but are not hearty in the cause of God.

V. 13—17.

If earnestness to prevent the delusion and destruction of our fellow-sinners, and in the great concerns of the eternal world, bring upon us the charge of being "beside ourselves;" we need only inquire, whether our conduct be warranted by the word of God, and spring from a regard to his authority and glory; and whether our most vehement affections and addresses, as well as our more cool and temperate reasonings, are really intended to promote the salvation of souls. If this be the case, we may venture to disregard the contumely: and we should pray for our revilers, that they may indeed "come to themselves," and be delivered from that insanity, under which all unbelievers are held.—If our "judgment" concerning our entirely lost estate as sinners, and the love of Christ as dying for our salvation, coincides with that of the apostles; we shall feel, in proportion to our faith and hope, the "constraining" influence of his love, powerfully exciting us "to live to him, who died for us and rose again." But many show the worthlessness of their professed faith and love; by "living to themselves" and to the world: and, alas! the views of most of us are so obscure, our judgments so unconfirmed, and our love so feeble, that, comparatively, we live but little to the glory of our gracious Lord. On this account we need to be deeply humbled; and to "pray without ceasing," that we may be enabled to live more zealously and diligently devoted to him.—All partialities, from external relations or connexions, patronage or obligations, hopes or fears, which tempt the minister to waver in his testimony, or the Christian in his obedience, are inconsistent with a proper regard to the Lord Jesus: and in this sense, we should "henceforth know no man after the flesh," whatever claim he may seem to have to our special regard. (Notes, Matt. 10:37—39. Luke 14:25—27.)—The justified believer is "a new creature" in a new world: his new relation to Christ, to the church, and to heavenly things; together with his new obligations, interests, pursuits, principles, and satisfactions, have superseded those, which formerly prevailed: yea, "old things have passed away; behold, all things are become new." Even the same actions are now performed from new motives and in a new manner, from what they before were; his attention to relative and social duties, and his diligence in worldly business, spring from new purposes, and receive a new direction. Nay, when balled by temptation, he falls into sin; his grief, his shame, his distress, and remorse, are altogether new, and such as before he never had experienced. His heart was then stone, now living flesh; and sensibilities wholly new arise from this important change. Those who know nothing of this new creation, and so cannot understand these things, are not in Christ, whatever they may presume: and the more evidently it has been and is experienced, the more clearly is a man's justification proved.

V. 18—21.

Every good gift comes from God, and to him the whole glory belongs. Even they who are "new creatures," yea, the apostles and martyrs, and all who are at present perfect spirits before the throne, were once "enemies to God by wicked works." This enmity to God began wholly on man's part; but the reconciliation was entirely devised, revealed, and effected by his offended Sovereign. In the person of Emmanuel, in his mediation and atonement, who "was made sin for us though he knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him," the foundation of this blessed reconciliation was laid; for "God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself. (Note, John 15:12—16.)—When the kings of the earth appoint ambassadors, they generally send them to those, who are of their own rank in society; nor would they deign to send a solemn embassy to their own rebellious subjects, when vanquished, disarmed, and condemned. But "the King of kings and Lord of lords," appoints ambassadors from himself to us poor apostate worms, and helpless perishing sinners!—Earthly princes select persons of dignity and eminence, to represent their persons and act by their authority, on these important occasions; but the Lord of glory deposes pardoned rebels, and reconciled enemies, to go to their former associates in rebellion, on this embassy of peace! (Note, Is. 55:8,9.) The gracious proposals which they are instructed to make, and the encouraging terms which they are commanded to use, are equally expressive of condescension, compassion, and good-will to men: for the Lord himself, who might justly, and could easily, destroy them for ever, is pleased to "beseech them to be reconciled to him!" This language of our God and Saviour, by his ministers, to his feeble but haughty enemies, must appear wonderful beyond conception to the holy inhabitants of heaven: yet the reception with which it often meets, and the contempt and disdain which it excites, must exceedingly increase their astonishment; and it will assuredly satisfy them, concerning the propriety and equity of punishing the irreconcilable haters of God, "with everlasting destruction from his presence." The "ambassadors for Christ," however, must adhere to their instructions, with whatever reception they may meet. They should "magnify their office," and endeavor to represent their Lord, by exhibiting his image in their own example, as well as "declaring his whole counsel." They must conform to the laws and customs of his kingdom, and not to those of this evil world; neither fearing the contempt or rage of men, while "in Christ's stead they pray them to be reconciled to God;" nor yet seeking to please men, or expecting any recompense, save from their gracious Lord.—On the other hand, let all who hear the gospel, remember that the faithful minister is the ambassador of Christ to them; sent to treat with them concerning "reconciliation to God;" and that his Lord will surely punish every insult and injury offered to him, as if done to himself in Person. The refusal of this proffered peace will leave men "the enemies of God" for ever: the removal of faithful ministers, from such as have slighted their message, is the recall of an ambassador of peace, and the fore-runner of a declaration of war. Let sinners then hear the voice of God, "beseeching them to be reconciled to him:" let the trembling penitent rejoice in the assurance, that his application for "peace with God will not be rejected." Let professed Christians examine their supposed interest in Christ, the great Reconciler, by inquiring whether they are become the friends of God, his cause, and his people: let ministers not only "warn men by the terror of the Lord," but beseech them by his abundant mercies, to repent and turn unto him: and let believers consider, whether God can now withhold any good thing from them; or whether they can venture, lose, labor, or suffer too much, for him who gave his beloved Son to be the Sacrifice for their sins, that they might be "made the righteousness of God in him." (Notes, 13—15. Rom. 5:7—10. 8:28—31.)

CHAP. VI.

The apostle earnestly exhorts the Corinthians, not to receive the grace of God in vain, but to seek salvation without delay, 1, 2. He most pathetically shows, by what labors, sufferings and patient endurance he, and his brethren, sought to render their ministry approved, 3—10. He assures them, that he spake of this the more freely out of the great love, which he bare to them, 11, 12; requiring the like affection from them, 13. He warns them against intimate connexions with unbelievers, seeing Christians are the temples of the living God, 14—16; and encourages them, by the promises of being received as the children of God, to separate from sinners and from sin, 17, 18.

2 (For he saith, I have heard thee in <sup>e</sup> a time accepted, and in the day of salvation have I succored thee: behold, now is the accepted time; behold, now is the day of salvation.)

Note.—The apostle and other faithful ministers, as “fellow-laborers of God;” (Note, 1 Cor. 3:4–9.) employed by him in reconciling the world unto himself, joined their earnest entreaties to the Corinthians also, as they had to others, that they would not “receive the grace of God in vain.” The word rendered “grace,” signifies any peculiar undeserved favor; and when it is used for the regenerating and sanctifying work of the Holy Spirit, it implies that this is a special undeserved favor. The unspeakable love of God to sinners, in the redemption by his Son and in the appointment of “the ministry of reconciliation;” and the mercy shown to those whom he thus “besought to be reconciled to him;” would be altogether in vain, to all those who “neglected so great salvation.” (Marg. Ref. a–d.—Note, Heb. 2:1–4, v. 3.) The apostle feared, that this had hitherto been the case of some professed Christians at Corinth: and doubtless many such would at length read or hear his epistle; whom therefore he most earnestly exhorted and entreated, not to render all the advantages set before them ineffectual to themselves, by persisting in unbelief; but that they would, without delay, while the word of God was faithfully preached to them, embrace the proposals of mercy and grace set before them. For as JEHOVAH had assured the Messiah, according to the revelation made by the prophet, that he had “heard him in an acceptable time, and succored him in a day of salvation,” with a special reference to his intercession for the Gentiles, after his exaltation to the mediatorial throne; (Note, Is. 49:7; 8.) so the present season of abundant spiritual advantages might be considered by the Corinthians, as “an accepted time and a day of salvation” to all, who sought an interest in the blessings of the Redeemer’s kingdom. But those who refused the embassy of peace or were satisfied with a formal assent, a dead and unholy faith, might expect to be speedily punished as the enemies of Christ. (*Marg. [Practical Observations.]

ers, while they thus zealously fulfilled their embassy of peace, behaved with the utmost circumspection, that they might “give no offence,” or cause of stumbling, in any thing; lest their imprudence or misconduct should expose their ministry to censure or contempt, and thus render it ineffectual. They therefore studied, and were enabled, in all things “to approve themselves” such persons, as the ministers of a holy God, in so gracious and sacred a service, ought to be. This they did, “by much patience,” resignation, constancy, and persevering assiduity, notwithstanding their multiplied and heavy afflictions. They were not discouraged, or induced to repine or despond, by urgent necessities and perplexing difficulties, even without obtaining a subsistence; or by repeated scourgings and imprisonments, from both Jewish and heathen magistrates; or by the tumultuous and overwhelming assaults of enraged mobs. But they patiently continued their labors, often spending the night, as well as the day, in unremitting toil; and adding religious fastings to those which absolute want imposed on them. (Marg. Ref. f—s.—Note, 1:24—27.) To this “patience” they were encouraged by the “pureness” of their motive; and they “approved themselves as the ministers of God,” by the holiness, temperance, and purity of their whole conduct. (Notes, Phil. 4:8,9. 1 Thes. 2:9—12. Jam. 3:17,18.) They also showed themselves competent to impart all kind of divine knowledge and instruction to the world: (Note, Eph. 3:1—7.) they meekly endured all injuries and insults; not only without seeking revenge, but without remitting their endeavors of doing good to their enemies, and of showing kindness to all men. They abounded in the fruits of the Holy Spirit, and confirmed their doctrine by his miraculous powers; and they exercised those gifts, disinterestedly and without ostentation, from “unfeigned love” to Christ, and the souls of men. (Marg. Ref. t—z.) They were “approved as the ministers of God,” by “the word of truth,” which they every where preached without adulteration; and by that “power of God” which rendered it effectual to the conversion of sinners, as well as by the miracles which they wrought. (Note, 1 Thes. 1:5—8.) They were also defended on every side by the compact armor of strict integrity, and a universal regard to the righteous commandments of God, from the purest evangelical principles. This fortified them against the assaults of carnal hope and fear, against the frowns and smiles of the tempter. (Marg. Ref. a—d.—Notes, Rom. 13:11—14. Eph. 6:14—17. 1 Thes. 5:4—11.) Thus they passed “through honor and dishonor, through evil report and good report,” without being elated by the distinctions conferred on them, or depressed by the ignominy to which they were exposed. The calumnies raised concerning them, and the commendations which they received, were alike incapable of drawing them aside from their steady course. The world indeed treated them “as deceivers,” who imposed cunningly devised fictions on the credulous: yet they were conscious of acting in all things as true and faithful men, and showed to mankind the true way of salvation. The noble and haughty of the world, either knew them not, or despised them as obscure persons unworthy of notice; but they were “well known” to multitudes, as the instruments of good to their souls. They seemed continually exposed to death, or even enduring its stroke; yet behold they still lived, by the marvellous power of God. (Marg. Ref. e—l.—Notes, 4:8—12. 1 Cor. 4:9—13.) They were chastened by him, as in a state of tuition, and he used the malice of their enemies as the rod of his salutary discipline: but they were “not killed.” They had constant reasons to be “sorrowful,” both on account of sins and sufferings, and of what they witnessed in the world and among their brethren; and were looked upon as most unhappy men: yet divine consolations rendered them habitually cheerful, and joyful in the Lord. Though poor and needy in this world, they were employed by God in “making many rich” unto eternal life: and while they had no estates or property on earth, they possessed all things, by their relation to Christ and their interest in the promises: so that the whole universe, if they had been the proprietors of it, could have afforded them nothing more, as conducive to their real good, than what they actually enjoyed or expected. (Marg. Ref. m—q.—Note, 1 Cor. 3:18—23.) Thus the whole of their temper and conduct, in the varied circumstances through which they passed, combined to show, that their doctrine had a blessed effect upon their own souls; and rendered them holy, beneficent, useful, and happy men.—The animation, sublimity, pathos, and energy of expression, in this beautiful passage, have been generally and justly admired; and it shows how full the apostle’s heart was of holy affections; and how open and communicative in speaking on these interesting topics. ‘This is certainly one of ‘the sublimest passages that ever was written.’ Doddridge.—Making many, &c. (10) ‘We are continually enriching many with treasures, which they would not part with for all the ‘revenues of kings and princes.’ Doddridge.

Note.—The apostle, being conscious of integrity and fervent affection to the Corinthians, opened his mouth, in this unreserved and energetic declaration of his principles, feelings, and conduct; so that he was not careful about the construction, which some might put upon his words: for his “heart was enlarged” with an earnest desire of communicating good to them. from his ministry, it would be wholly owing to themselves. They were not "straitened in him;" for Christ had made him both able and willing to be useful to them: but they were "straitened in their own bowels" or hearts, through unkind suspicions, groundless prejudices, and disaffection. Now the whole which he desired, as "the recompense" of all his love to them, and his labors and sufferings for their good, (for he considered and spake to them as his beloved children,) was, that they would "be enlarged" after his example; and open their hearts in love, to receive the salutary counsels, cautions, and exhortations, which he gave them in the character of a tender and prudent father. 14 ¶ Be ye not <sup>a</sup> unequally yoked together with unbelievers: <sup>b</sup> for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? <sup>c</sup> and what communion hath light with darkness?

16 And <sup>g</sup> what agreement hath the temple of God with idols? for <sup>h</sup> ye are the temple of the living God; as God hath said, <sup>i</sup> I will dwell in them, and walk in them: and <sup>k</sup> I will be their God, and they shall be my people.

18 And will be <sup>n</sup> a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith <sup>o</sup> the Lord Almighty.

Note.—The apostle especially entreated his beloved children, not to contract marriages, or form any intimate connexions with unbelievers, to which carnal motives might induce them. (Marg. Ref. a.) For this would resemble that unequal yoking of different animals, which the law of Moses forbid; (Note, Lev. 19:19.) and would tend to make them uneasy to each other; and indeed produce many very bad effects. For, if believers connected themselves with unbelievers, their views, principles, pursuits, and satisfactions must be discordant. The believer would be retarded and interrupted in his religious exercises, or his various duties in the family, in the church, and to mankind, or drawn aside from them. And what cordial and comfortable intercourse could be maintained between the "righteousness" of the one, and the "unrighteousness" of the other party? What "fellowship" could there be, in the most important matters, between the children of the light and those of darkness? What agreement could be expected between the servant of Christ and one in whom Belial, or Satan, who had cast off the yoke of obedience to God, abode and wrought? And what part or share could a believer take in the unhallowed pursuits and pleasures of an unbeliever, who despised the blessed gospel of Christ? For "righteousness and unrighteousness," "light and darkness," "Christ and Belial" might as easily associate in cordiality, as the believer and the unbeliever: all intercourse between them must be attended with restraint, disguise, or jarring sentiments and discord. Persons so discordant from each other would live in different elements; they would draw different ways, and counteract each other's purposes: so that the unbeliever must be a trial, a snare, a clog, and a hindrance to the believer. (Marg. Ref. b—c.) In particular, what agreement could subsist between "the temple of God and idols?" Would JEHOVAH endure to have these hated rivals placed even in his own temple? Now Christians were "the temple of God," his special residence, consecrated by the Holy Spirit. (Marg. Ref. g—k.—Notes, 1 Cor. 3:16,17. 6:12—17. Eph. 2:19—22.) For thus he had promised of old to believing Israelites, and with a view to the days of Christ; that "he would dwell in them," or "take up his in-dwelling in them," "and walk in them," as a man in his habitation, and so "be their God." (Notes, Lev. 26:11,12. Jer. 32:39—41.)—Let the Corinthians, therefore, value this special relation to God; and, as far as their relative and social duties would permit, let them separate from their heathen neighbors, and be careful to touch no unclean thing, or ought that pertained to idolatry or iniquity. (Marg. Ref. l.—Notes, Ps. 1:1—3. 141:3,4. Prov. 9:1—6. 18:1,2. Is. 52:11,12.) Eating things offered to idols, or with idolaters in their festivals, seems to be specially intended. (Notes, 1 Cor. 8:10:18—33.) In this case they might be assured, that the Lord would graciously accept of them, and "receive them" into his special favor: yea, that he would be in every respect "a Father to them;" and provide for them, and protect, comfort, enrich, and bless them, as "his sons and daughters," by regeneration and adoption. This "the Lord Almighty," the omnipotent Ruler of the universe, had repeatedly intimated by the ancient prophets; and he now declared it more explicitly by his apostles, even in respect of the Gen-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10.

It is the peculiar honor of faithful ministers and zealous Christians, in their several ways, to concur most willingly in the great designs of their Lord; to labor in concert with him, and with each other; and to join their sincere entreaties with his condescending invitations, in beseeching sinners "not to receive the grace of God in vain:" but tempters, seducers, false teachers, persecutors, scoffers, and all who oppose or disgrace the cause of God, are fellow-workers of the devil. The gracious declaration of the gospel, and all the abundant provision, which is made in Christ Jesus for the salvation of sinners; the labors of the most affectionate pastors, yea, the invitations of God himself by them, are often rendered ineffectual to those who hear them, through negligence, contempt, enmity, pride, and love of sin; save as they occasion their deeper condemnation. (Notes, 2:14—17. John 3:19—21.) To prevent this fatal consequence as far as we are able, we should warn, expostulate, persuade, entreat, and exhort men, by every means which we can devise, to attend to "this one thing needful." We should show them, that "now is the accepted time, and the day of salvation;" that the present day alone is theirs; the past is irrevocable: the future may find them in eternity; their reason may fail them, the gospel may be withdrawn, or God may determine to leave them to final obduracy. (Notes, Luke 13:22—30. 19:41—44. John 12:34—41. Heb. 3:7—13.)—Through the intercession of the divine Saviour, whom the Father hath "heard in the accepted time, and succored in the day of salvation" by carrying him through his sufferings, and exalting him to his heavenly glory, we now enjoy a day of grace:

let then all be careful to avail themselves of it, while the gospel is sounding in their ears, and perhaps the convincing Spirit is striving with their consciences.—It is peculiarly incumbent on all who preach this great salvation, to "give no offence in any thing," except by their faithfulness, "that the ministry be not blamed;" and "in all things to approve themselves, as the ministers of God," who are sent to show the descendants of fallen Adam, the way of eternal life. (Note, 1 Cor. 10:29—33.) Patience under afflictions; constancy in necessities and distresses; perseverance under persecutions; assiduity in labors, watchings, and fastings; purity, knowledge, meekness, kindness, a spiritual mind, "unfeigned love;" sound doctrine, producing an evident change by the power of God, in men's characters; disinterested steady integrity, as "an armor of righteousness on the right hand and on the left;" are proper attestations of "the ministers of God." Thus supported, they may pass "through honor and dishonor;" they may go on unmoved, amidst "evil report and good report:" conscious of truth and sincerity, they may disregard the accusation of being "deceivers;" known and approved by God and his people, they may be reconciled to obscurity or contempt in the world. Their dangers and deliverances, their chastenings and consolations, their outward sorrow and inward rejoicing, their poverty and usefulness in enriching others, their contentment with, yea sometimes almost without, food and raiment, and their participation of "the unsearchable riches of Christ," may be contrasted with each other; and the whole of their conduct, circumstances, and labors, will concur to recommend their doctrine to mankind. But alas! how very few of those, who wear the garb or bear the office of ministers, answer this description! How very many are the exact reverse of it! How often do even the preachers of the gospel give such offence, and cause such scandals, by their evident, allowed, and habitual misconduct; that "the ministry is blamed," and men are fatally prejudiced against the truth! And how common is it for us to be drawn into those improprieties of conduct, which prevent the usefulness of our most earnest exhortations! We should therefore continually beseech the Lord, to erase every unfavorable impression, which any past misconduct may have made on men's minds; and to prepare us for serving him more unexceptionably for the future: that we may give up every worldly interest and indulgence, and be willing to labor and suffer in the cause of Christ. We should seek to be made "fruitful in good works;" to be endued with "purity and knowledge;" to be strengthened in the exercise of long-suffering and kindness; to be "armed with the whole armor of God;" to rejoice in the midst of tribulation; to be far more desirous of making others rich, than of avoiding poverty in our own circumstances; to leave our character and concerns in the Lord's hands; and to count ourselves "to possess all things," in his all-sufficient favor, and exceedingly great and precious promises. (Notes, Phil. 4:10—20. Heb. 13:5,6.)

imbibed prejudices: "our mouths will be opened" in the cause of Christ, by the consciousness, that we seek the good of the people alone, and not our own emolument or reputation. We shall be far more grieved when they close their minds against our instructions, than when they refuse to communicate to our necessities: and the most desired "recompense," of "our labor of love," will be their readiness to receive the truth from our lips.—It will especially be near the heart of such pastors, to caution their "beloved children" in the gospel, not to be "unequally yoked with unbelievers." The fatal effects of neglecting the scriptural precept in this matter are most evident. They whose trial it is to be thus connected, without their wilful fault, may expect peculiar consolations under it: but when believers will thrust themselves into these disadvantageous circumstances, contrary to the express warnings of God's word, they may expect to feel great and often very durable additional distress. Indeed, all intimate connexions with unbelievers should be avoided. There can be no profitable "communion" between contrary characters: the attempt of making a coalition between Christ and Belial is unnatural and abominable; the kingdoms of righteousness and unrighteousness, of light and darkness, must wage perpetual war with each other; (Note, Gen. 3:14,15.) and we are most likely to do good to unbelievers, when we stand aloof from all other intercourse with them, besides that of duty and compassion. If we be Christians indeed, we are "the temples of the living God:" and "what have we then to do any more with idols?" Let us value our relation to him, and not profane it: let us admire his condescending promises, of "dwelling and walking in us" poor sinners, whom he hath reconciled to himself by Jesus Christ. Let us earnestly desire to have his temple made and kept pure, that we may have the comfort of his manifested presence. Let us beseech him to be our God and Portion, and to number us with his chosen people. "Let us come out from among" the workers of iniquity; and separate from all their vain and sinful pleasures and pursuits, and from all conformity to the corrupt customs and fashions of this evil world. (Notes, Rom. 12:1,2.) Let us not touch any gain or indulgence that is spotted with sin. Let us remember that the world, though called Christian, still "lieth in wickedness," and is full of unclean things which we must abhor. Let us assure ourselves that the Lord will receive all those, who come in his appointed way, and at his call; and that he "will be a Father unto them," and take them for his children: and if it be so envied a privilege, to be the son or daughter of some earthly potentate; who can express the dignity and felicity of being "the sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty!" (Note, 1 John 3:1—3.)

CHAP. VII.

The apostle exhorts the Corinthians to follow after holiness, encouraged by the preceding promises, 1; and to receive him, who had done nothing to forfeit their esteem, but had great love for them and confidence in them, 2—4. He shows what comfort, under his troubles,

Titus's good account of them gave him, 5—7; so that he does not repent of having grieved them by his former Epistle, considering the happy effects of their godly sorrow, 8—11. He wrote to approve his care of them as in the sight of God, 12; and he rejoices, especially, in the joy of Titus, and in his affection for them, as excited by their good conduct, which was answerable to the apostle's former boasting concerning them, 13—16.

Note.—This verse is evidently connected with the subject of the former chapter. (Note, 6:14—18.) The promises, which God has given in the gospel, should excite all those who hear them to aspire after holiness, and animate them in following after it. (Marg. Ref. a, b.—Notes, Ez. 36:25—27. 2 Pet. 1:3,4.) All sin is "filthiness" in the judgment of God, because contrary to his holy nature and law. Sensual lusts may be called "filthiness of the flesh;" while pride, envy, revenge, avarice, idolatry, and all ungodliness may be intended by the "filthiness of the spirit;" or the former may signify the outward expression of sin by the body in word or deed; the latter, its inward workings in the imagination and affections. It should, however, be noted, that the apostle speaks of "filthiness of the spirit;" whereas modern theologians often speak as if the body alone were the seat of pollution. (Marg. Ref. c.—Notes, Rom. 8:5—9. Gal. 5:16—21.)—Aspiring after acceptance, adoption, and communion with God, and depending on his promises, Christians ought to cleanse themselves from all pollution: constantly watching against all evil thoughts, desires, words, and works; mortifying every corrupt propensity; renouncing every sinful interest or pleasure; seeking for an increase of spirituality in judgment and heart, and abounding in every good word and action. In this manner they ought to proceed in "perfecting holiness," and in seeking entire conformity to the holy image and law of God, from reverence to his authority, fear of his displeasure, and an habitual sense of his holy heart-searching presence. Thus they should persevere, in unremitting endeavors after perfect holiness, as long as they live; because their highest attainments leave them far short of sinless perfection. (Marg. Ref. d.—Notes, Phil. 3:12—16.) In this the apostle joined himself: thus intimating, that he too needed more perfect cleansing from the filthiness of sin; and that he called on others to do nothing, but the same which he himself was continually endeavoring to accomplish.—Perfecting, &c.] 'Still making progress in holiness.' Whitby. If any were perfect, in the strict sense of the word, the exhortation would not suit them. It would not be properly addressed to a holy angel, or to "the spirits of just men made perfect."

4 Great is m my boldness of speech towards you, n great is my glorying of you: o I am filled with comfort, I am exceeding joyful in all our tribulation.

Note.—The apostle here returned to his more immediate purpose of re-establishing his authority among the Corinthians. (Note, 6:11—13.) He called on them, to "receive" him and his brethren as the ambassadors of Christ. There could be no reason for a contrary conduct; as they had "injured no man," in his person or connexions; "corrupted no man," in his principles or morals; and "defrauded no man" in regard to his property, or in any respect coveted ought belonging to them. (Marg. Ref. f, g.)—He did not speak thus, as disposed to condemn them for bringing such charges against him; for he had so favorable an opinion of them in general, that they were most dear to his heart, as he had before intimated: (3:2.) and if other engagements would have permitted, he would willingly have spent and ended the remnant of his days among them. (Marg. Ref. h—l.) Indeed he was so confident that they would submit to his apostolical authority, that he addressed them with great freedom and boldness, not fearing but they would take it in good part; and he even gloried among his friends concerning their conduct in the late transactions; yea, he was filled with such comfort on that account, as abundantly counterbalanced all his trials. 7 And not by his coming only, y but by the consolation wherewith he was comforted in you, z when he told us your a earnest desire, your b mourning, your c fervent mind toward me; so that I rejoiced the more.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—After the apostle had passed from Troas into Macedonia, (Note, 2:12,13.) he was so harassed with persecution, that he "had no rest in his flesh," or in respect of his outward circumstances: and he was "troubled on every side;" because the outward conflicts which he sustained with his enemies, concurred with much inward anxiety about the church at Corinth. (Marg. Ref. p—t.—Notes, 4:3—12. 6:3—10. 11:23—31.) But that God, whose peculiar character, prerogative, and delight it is, "to comfort" such of his servants as are dejected and discouraged, and indeed all those who are humble and lowly in heart, was pleased "to comfort him" by the arrival of Titus from Corinth. His safety and company were sources of satisfaction to the apostle: but he was still more rejoiced at the comfort which he had received from the behavior of the Corinthians, and while Titus described their earnest desire to remedy all the evils, which had gained admission among them; at their poignant sorrow for having dishonored the gospel, and their fervent affection towards the apostle, and zeal for him. So that his present joy was rendered the more abundant, even by means of the sorrow which had preceded it. (Marg. Ref. u—b.—Note, 9—11.)

Note.—The inspiration of the Holy Spirit did not supersede the exercise of the understanding, and faculties, in the sacred writers: and the apostle's excess of concern, about the consequences of his former epistle, seems to have rendered his mind greatly disquieted, as to some expressions in it, lest they should counteract his grand design. If indeed he actually "repented" of having written so sharply, as well as had felt an after carefulness about it, as the word implies; this must not be ascribed to the things written, as if they had not been divinely inspired; but to infirmity, as not being fully sanctified, or freed from a propensity to excess of anxiety and solicitude.—A physician, in full confidence that the case requires it, may give a powerful remedy to a sick friend; and yet his anxiety, about the event, arising from concurring circumstances, may induce him sometimes to wish he had not given it. (Marg. Ref.)—Some however render the passage, perhaps more accurately, "Even if I had repented, I should not now repent." Note, Rom. 9:1—3.)

9 Now <sup>f</sup>I rejoice, not that ye were made sorry, but that ye sorrowed to repentance: for ye were made sorry * after a godly manner, <sup>g</sup> that ye might receive damage by us in nothing.

11 For behold, this self-same thing, <sup>k</sup> that ye sorrowed after a godly sort, what <sup>l</sup> carefulness it wrought in you, yea, what <sup>m</sup> clearing of yourselves, yea, what <sup>n</sup> indignation, yea, what <sup>o</sup> fear, yea, what <sup>p</sup> vehement desire, yea, what <sup>q</sup> zeal, yea, what <sup>r</sup> revenge! In all things ye have <sup>s</sup> approved yourselves to be clear in this matter.

Note.—The apostle understood, that his epistle had made the Corinthians sorry, as he expected it would; but this lasted only for a short space: he therefore "rejoiced," not in their sorrow which he shared; but in their repentance which had been effected by it. For they had "been sorrowful according to God;" under the influence of his grace, with reference to his will and glory, and in dependence on his mercy: and this had been so ordered, that they might receive damage, from the apostle, in no respect, not even as the innocent occasion of it. (Marg. Ref. f, g.) For that "sorrow," which was the effect of divine grace, and the fear of God, was suited directly to work repentance in the heart, and to render it humble, contrite, submissive, afraid of punishment, dependent on mercy, disposed to renounce and mortify every sin, and to walk in newness of life. So that this was "repentance unto salvation;" as always connected with faith in Christ and an interest in his atonement; and no man would ever repent of thus sorrowing and repenting.—Some are of opinion that the word, rendered

"not to be repented of," should be referred to "salvation," rather than to "repentance;" in the same sense as it is applied to "the gifts and calling of God," in the only place, where the same word occurs in the New Testament, signifying its unchangeableness; or denoting a salvation, which will infinitely more than compensate all that may be endured in attaining it: and the construction, in the original, seems to favor this opinion. (Marg. Ref. h.)—This godly sorrow, however, was totally distinct from the sorrow of carnal men about worldly objects; which, being separated from the fear and love of God, and faith in his mercy, often drank up their spirits, broke their proud rebellious hearts, drove them to suicide, or prompted them to the most desperate wickedness; and so "worked death" temporal and eternal. "The sorrow of the world," is the certain way to desperation, unless "God prevent it; as it appears from the horrid examples of Cain, Saul, Ahithophel, and Judas: but the written tears 'of David give the clearest example of the other kind of sorrow.' Beza.—(Marg. Ref. i.—Notes, Gen. 4:13—15. 1 Sam. 28:20—25. 31:3—6. 2 Sam. 17:23. Ps. 32:51. 126:5,6. Matt. 5:4. 27:3—5.)—It was evident that the sorrow of the Corinthians had been "after a godly sort," from their "carefulness" to rectify and amend what had been amiss, and their ready obedience in censuring the criminal: from their "desire" to show, that their connivance at the evils, which had taken place, was not the effect of corrupt principles, but of inattention; that by thus "clearing themselves," they might preserve the credit of the gospel; from their "indignation" at themselves, for having thus disgraced their profession; from their "fear" lest such evils should again occur; from their most "earnest desire" of further degrees of purity; from their "zeal" for the glory of God; and from their desire, as it were, to revenge his cause on themselves, by submitting to any humiliations or corrections, which were requisite for the honor of the gospel: (Marg. Ref. k—q.) so that in every thing, they were now freed from further imputation in this transaction. Numbers of them thus showed that they had not been directly guilty, though they had inadvertently connived at the offenders; and of this connivance they had repented, and sought forgiveness. Others, who had been more directly criminal, had likewise repented, and concurred in such measures, as implied a decided protest against the sins which had disgraced the cause of Christ, and those teachers who allowed of them; and thus the church, as a society, was cleared from the guilt and infamy, under which it lay; and the whole blame now rested with the individuals, who still persisted in impenitence. (Marg. Ref. l.)—As this verse relates to the conduct of a Christian society in particular circumstances, and probably some of the clauses to one part and some to another of this society; so the several particulars adduced

Note.—The apostle further assured the Corinthians that he had not written, concerning the incestuous person, from a personal dislike to him, or merely on his account in any respect; nor from regard to his father, who had been so grossly wronged in this matter; (Note, 1 Cor. 5:1—5.) but in order to show to them, as in the sight of God, his diligent and vigilant attention to their spiritual interests.—The other offenders at Corinth might also be alluded to; but it is evident, that the principal criminal was more directly intended. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 1 Cor. 6:1—8.)

13 Therefore we were comforted in your comfort: yea, and exceedingly the more joyed we for the joy of Titus, because his spirit was refreshed by you all.

14 For if I have boasted any thing to him of you, I am not ashamed; but as we spake all things to you in truth, even so our boasting, which I made before Titus, is found a truth:

15 And his inward affection is more abundant toward you, whilst he remembereth the obedience of you all, how with fear and trembling ye received him.

16 I rejoice therefore, that I have confidence in you in all things.

Note.—The apostle's endeavors had been made very successful, and had eventually terminated in the comfort of the Christians at Corinth: and he now shared their consolations, as he had before sympathized in their sorrows. It also increased his joy, to see how joyful their conduct had rendered the pious heart of his beloved Titus. If then he had before spoken so confidently of them, that it seemed to be "boasting," he was not ashamed of it: for as his doctrine, and his professed affection for them, had been approved to be faithful and "true;" so this his boasting of them to Titus had proved true also. (Marg. Ref. x—a.—Note, 9:1—5.) The love of Titus also towards them was greatly increased, while he remembered the obedience, which in general all had shown to the authority of the apostle signified by him: and how they received him even with a trembling fear, lest they should grieve him, or impress his mind unfavorably towards them. So that the apostle could now rejoice in the "confidence, which he had in them in all things." (Marg. Ref. b—d.)—There was great address in this part of the epistle: and his kind acceptance of what had been done, and the confidence which he expressed in the church, were in general well suited to excite them to a more entire reformation; to withstand the party formed against him; to deliver them from the fascinations of the false teachers; to re-establish the apostle's authority; and to prepare the way for his subsequent exhortations, warnings, expositions, and direct accusations and denunciations of the principal offenders, and of all who continued impenitent. For they implied, that not the church as a society, but merely a few corrupt intruders were the subjects of these severe addresses.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

The promises of God should excite and direct us in "following after holiness." His grace alone can efficaciously "purify" us: but it is our duty earnestly to use the means which he has appointed; and, depending on that grace, to search out and cleanse away all "filthiness of the flesh and spirit," as abhorred by God and all his people. Perfect holiness should be the object of our unremitting prayers and endeavors: we ought to follow after it, as in the presence of God, and influenced by the fear of him, when no eye but his can possibly witness our conduct; and our lamented imperfections should excite us the more diligently to "go on unto perfection."—If the ambassadors or messengers of Christ would be received in that character; they must be careful "to wrong no man, to corrupt no man, to defraud no man;" or in any way to manifest a propensity to covetousness: (Notes, Is. 56:9—12. Jer. 6:13—15. 1 Tim. 3:3. 1 Pet. 5:1—4.) and they who reject those ministers of Christ, whose conduct and doctrine are thus uncorrupt, will greatly offend him that sent them. Yet we should avoid all rigorous censures, and show cordial love to the people notwithstanding their faults: we should express as much confidence in them, and speak as favorably of them, as the case will admit; and when they show a readiness to amend what hath grieved us; we should deem this a comfort, sufficient to render us "exceedingly joyful in all our tribulation." But we ought not to expect much "rest to our flesh" in this evil world: and if inward "fears" concur with outward opposition, to distress us; we only taste that cup, of which far wiser and better men have drunk more abundantly.—We cannot sufficiently admire the compassion and condescension of our God, in revealing himself as "the Comforter of those that are cast down."

In all our dejections and perplexities therefore let us rely on him, as our all-sufficient Helper. And seeing the time of our extreme distress is commonly that of his merciful and effectual interposition, we should endeavor to make it that of our most enlarged expectations. He, however, generally works by second causes and instruments: the converse of some pious friend; or a good account of those about whom we are anxious; or the affection of such as we feared were alienated, are often sources of relief and consolation, in which the kindness of the Lord should be acknowledged with much thankfulness.

V. 8—16.

Through anxiety about the event of his labors, even the faithful minister may be tempted to repent of his best intended and most scriptural endeavors to do good. He may fear that he spake too decidedly, or sharply; and so gave needless offence, or excited undue sorrow: when he only performed the office of an affectionate reprover, under the influence of the Spirit of truth and love. Thus a man may be much disquieted for having done his duty, and afraid of doing it on another occasion: and this should be carefully watched against with humble persevering prayer. Indeed, we should be reluctant to cause sorrow; even as the skilful and tender surgeon is averse to give pain, though he finds it often necessary: but we should rejoice in bringing men to that "godly sorrow, which worketh repentance;" as their grief will be transient, and the benefit eternal.—The loss of an earthly friend, the displeasure of a powerful superior, or other secular misfortunes, excite men's sorrow, and they think they have cause to mourn: how then should they be grieved for having offended their Creator, dishonored his name, incurred his frown, and deserved eternal misery! The objects of worldly sorrow are trivial; its exercise is commonly unavailing; and it tends to death in diverse and most awful ways: we should therefore be peculiarly careful not to indulge it. Unless sin be mourned over, as the cause of men's sufferings, and God be regarded, as the righteous and merciful Author of them; their sorrow under afflictions and calamities leads to increasing enmity, to distraction, despair, and blasphemy. (Notes, Rev. 16:8—11.) We should therefore endeavor to turn all our mourning into a religious channel, that we may "sorrow after a godly sort." But even sorrow about sin and our eternal concerns will be of no use to us, unless it "worketh repentance;" and even repentance itself may be counterfeited or spurious, and so not be "unto salvation." Of all deceptions this is most to be feared; as immense multitudes are quieted without true repentance, by a groundless notion that they have repented, or do repent. A partial and superficial repentance; an unbelieving and despairing repentance, like that of Judas; a pharisaical repentance, which is presented as an atonement for sin, and the rival of Christ's expiation; outward penances, mortifications, and observances, with an unhumiliated and unrenewed heart; apparent contrition, without renouncing the favorite iniquity, or throwing back "the wages of unrighteousness;" these, and other kinds of repentance, are not "unto salvation," but must be repented of, either in this world or for ever in hell. But deep humiliation before God, hatred and dread of all sin, attended by faith in the righteousness, atonement, and intercession of Christ, a new heart and a new life, constitute "repentance unto salvation never to be repented of." May the Lord bestow it on every one of us!—"Sorrowing after this godly manner" will work great carefulness and watchfulness in us, to amend our lives and subdue every iniquity: we shall thus be led to earnest and persevering endeavors to clear up the reality of our repentance to our own consciences, and to all men; we shall feel "an indignation" at ourselves for past transgressions; a fear of relapsing into sin; a vehement desire of forgiveness and sanctifying grace; a zeal for the honor of God; and a revenge, as it were, against those lusts which have excited us to offend him. When the faithful minister of Christ, who has warned sinners of their guilt and danger, and reproved inconsistent professors of the gospel, ("that his care of them in the sight of God" might be evidenced,) witnesses such "fruits meet for repentance," he will be comforted, in helping the comfort of the mourning penitents; he will rejoice in the joy of other believers on their account; he will exult in realizing the favorable hopes which he had before entertained; he will encourage the abundant affection of others towards them; he will commend their prompt and circumspect obedience, and "rejoice to have confidence in them in all things."

CHAP. VIII.

The apostle sets before the church at Corinth the liberality of the poor Christians in Macedonia, 1—5; and excites them to imitate this liberality, toward the poor saints in Judea; that they might abound as much "in this grace," as in other things; and show the sincerity of their love, as animated by the self-abasing and self-denying love of Christ to them, 6—8. They had before shown a readiness to this contribution, which would be graciously accepted by the Lord, 10—15. He commends to them Titus, and two other brethren, whom he had engaged in this service; and who were on many accounts worthy of their peculiar regard, 16—24.

4 Praying us with much intreaty <sup>l</sup> that we would receive the gift, and <sup>m</sup> take upon us the fellowship of <sup>n</sup> the ministering to the saints.

5 And thus they did, not as we hoped, but <sup>n</sup> first gave their own selves to the Lord, and <sup>o</sup> unto us by the will of God.

Note.—The mention, which the apostle had made of his confidence in the Corinthians, gave him an occasion of again introducing the subject of the collection, that he was making for the Christians in Judea, which takes up this and the following chapter. (Notes, Rom. 15: 22—29. 1 Cor. 16:1,2.) With great delicacy and propriety, he brought this forward by “informing” them, as an article of interesting intelligence, concerning the admirable conduct of the churches at Philippi, Thessalonica, and Berea, in Macedonia. In extolling the generosity of the Christians in these cities, he calls it “the grace of God bestowed upon” men; the cause being thus manifested by the effect. Though the Christians in these cities had been tried with grievous afflictions and persecutions, by which they had been greatly impoverished: yet “the abundance of their joy,” in the Lord and his salvation, had so enlarged their hearts to love him, and his poor disciples whom they had not seen; that a large collection had been made among them, and “their deep poverty abounded to the riches of their liberality,” and thus illustrated it. So that the apostle testified in their behalf, that they were willing of themselves, not only to do as much as was in their power, even more than could have been expected from them; but that their inclinations were larger than their ability, and they would gladly have done more if they had been able. ‘I have performed all, even with an industry beyond my power.’ Demosthenes. (Marg. Ref. c—k.) Nay, instead of needing to be solicited, they had entreated him to accept of their contributions, and to take a part in the charge of conveying them to Jerusalem, and applying them to the intended purposes. In all this, they had exceeded his most sanguine hopes concerning them: for they first devoted themselves to the Lord Jesus, as his redeemed and “peculiar people, zealous of good works;” and then “they gave their own selves to the” apostle, and his fellow-laborers, to be directed by them in doing the will of God, according to his appointment, and in improving their talents to his glory. (Marg. Ref. l—o.)—The word rendered grace, is no doubt sometimes translated gift; but to interpret “the grace of God towards the churches, &c.” to signify the large subscription for the poor Christians in Judea, as some learned men do, is wholly unprecedented; and the obvious meaning, viz. that their bounty to their poor brethren, was the effect of the abundant grace of God conferred on them, agrees far better with the simple and reasonable language of scripture on these subjects. (Marg. Ref. h.—Notes, 16—24. 1 Chr. 29:10—19. 1 Cor. 15:3—11, v. 10.)

9 For ye know <sup>b</sup> the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that <sup>c</sup> though he was rich, yet <sup>d</sup> for your sakes <sup>e</sup> he became poor, <sup>f</sup> that ye through his poverty might be rich.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—If the poor and persecuted Macedonians had exceeded expectation “in the riches of their liberality,” the prosperous and affluent Christians at Corinth would doubtless fully answer the apostle’s hopes of them. When Titus had before been there, he had begun this good work among them; and Paul had therefore desired him to go again and complete it.—By “the same grace also” most expositors understand the benefaction itself, and indeed the word may signify the free gift of man, as well as that of God; yet it seems more consonant to the apostle’s language, to explain it of the gracious influence of the Holy Spirit on their hearts, than of the gift itself, or their act of grace towards their brethren. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. p. x.—Notes, 1—5. 1 Cor. 15:3—11. Eph. 3:8.) As, however, the Corinthians abounded in all spiritual gifts, and in various Christian graces, they would doubtless “abound in this grace also;” and exceed other churches as much, in the largeness of their contributions, as they did in affluence, or in faith, knowledge, utterance, and spiritual gifts. (Marg. Ref. q—u.—Notes, 1 Cor. 1:4—9. 4:8. 12:4—11.) He did not speak this, as a “commandment” how much each person, or the whole company ought to give: but, from the forwardness of their poorer brethren, he took occasion to make trial of their sincerity, in the love which they professed to Christ and his people, and which would be trusted be satisfactorily demonstrated. (Marg. Ref. y—a.—Notes, Rom. 12:9—

For they knew and believed, and, as he was persuaded, were experimentally acquainted with “the grace” and most free and unmerited love of Christ to sinners, “that, though he was rich” in all the glory, authority, sufficiency, and felicity of the Godhead; yet “for their sakes,” who were in themselves poor, guilty, polluted, and perishing sinners, “he had become poor,” by assuming human nature, being born of a poor virgin in a stable; living in poverty and affliction for many years on earth; and at length entirely impoverishing himself, as it were, to pay their debt, and ransom their souls by his sacrifice on the cross. All this he submitted to most freely, in unspeakable compassion and condescension, that “they by his poverty might be made rich,” with all the blessings of salvation; the mighty debt of sin having been thus discharged, and the forfeited inheritance of eternal life redeemed, with all things pertaining to their everlasting glory and felicity: and surely they could want no other argument to prevail with them to part, largely and freely, with their temporal riches, for the relief and support of his poor brethren! (Marg. Ref. b—f.—Notes, Matt. 12:46—50. 25:34—40. Eph. 3:8,14—19.)—In the judgment of the apostle, Jesus was rich before he was poor; and it was voluntarily and graciously that he became poor for our sakes, &c. But indeed as Man he was born and educated in poverty; he was poor all his life, and “had not where to lay his head,” and only became rich after his death and resurrection; and therefore if he was no more than man, he certainly was poor before he was rich, not rich before he was poor.

10 And herein <sup>ε</sup> I give my advice: for this is <sup>h</sup> expedient for you, who have begun before, not only to do, but also <sup>i</sup> to be * forward a year ago.

11 Now therefore perform the doing of it; that as there was a readiness to will, so there may be a performance also out of that which ye have.

12 For <sup>k</sup> if there be first a willing mind, it is accepted according to that a man hath, and not according to that he hath not.

13 For I mean <sup>l</sup> not that other men be eased, and ye burdened:

14 But by an equality, that now, at this time, your abundance may be a supply for their want, that their abundance also may be a supply for your want, that there may be equality;

15 As it is written, <sup>m</sup> He that had gathered much had nothing over; and he that had gathered little had no lack

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—In respect of this service, to which the Corinthians would, as it was supposed, feel themselves “constrained by the love of Christ,” the apostle only offered his advice: (Note, 5: 13—15.) for it would be expedient for them, or profitable to them, and consistent with their profession and character, evidently to copy that love by which they were saved: especially as they had begun a year before, not only to deposit money for this use; but to enter upon the service, with a willing, earnest, and fervent mind. It behoved them therefore to make no hesitation about performing it; that their actions might coincide with the promptitude of their former determinations. In doing this, let every one of them proportion his contribution to his circumstances; for a small sum would be equally acceptable from a poorer person, as a larger from his more wealthy brother. (Marg. Ref. h—k.—Note, Mark 12:41—44. P. O. 35—44. Notes, Acts 11:27—30. 1 Cor. 16:1—4.) Indeed, in every case, where “a willing mind” to honor and obey Christ, from humble love to him, was the principle of a man’s actions; his services would meet with a gracious acceptance; nor would more be expected from him than he was enabled to do. To express and evidence this ready mind, the proportion, before recommended, would be necessary: yet it would not be proper, to urge any man to exceed what he was thus disposed to give: lest, by competition with his brethren, he should entrench upon other duties. Nor did the apostle mean to relieve the poor Christians in Judea, by burdening those at Corinth; or even to exact from them, and exempt other churches, so as to give rest to the one and affliction to the other. He only desired that some measure of “equality” might be preserved among brethren in Christ: and that, in order to this, the Corinthians should, on the present occasion, communicate from their abundance, to relieve the necessities of their poor brethren in Judea: and then, if a reverse in circumstances should take place, through persecutions or calamities, either to individuals or the collective body; the abundance of the Jewish converts, or of other churches, might be a fund for the supply of their necessities. Thus one might help another after an equal manner; according as it was written concerning the Israelites, respecting the manna; which, though collected in different quantities, being thus properly dispensed, was all used without the redundancy being wasted, or any of the congregation left destitute of a sufficient supply. 20.)—“So far Christianity seems to require this equality, as that we should not suffer others to lack the necessaries of this present life, while we abound in them.” Whitby.—The Christians at Corinth had also been made partakers of the inestimable spiritual blessings of their Jewish brethren, and at their expense; and it was equal or equitable, that they should impart to them, in return, of their carnal things. 16 But <sup>n</sup> thanks be to God, which put the same <sup>o</sup> earnest care into the heart of Titus for you.

17 For indeed he <sup>p</sup> accepted the exhortation; <sup>q</sup> but being more forward, of his own accord he went unto you.

18 And we have sent with him <sup>r</sup> the brother, whose praise is in the gospel <sup>s</sup> throughout all the churches;

19 And not that only, <sup>t</sup> but who was also chosen of the churches to travel with us with this * grace, which is administered by us, <sup>u</sup> to the glory of the same Lord, and declaration of your ready mind:

20 Avoiding this, <sup>x</sup> that no man should blame us in this abundance, which is administered by us:

22 And we have sent with them our brother, <sup>a</sup> whom we have oftentimes proved diligent in many things, but now much more diligent, upon the great confidence which † I have in you.

23 Whether any do inquire of <sup>d</sup> Titus, he <sup>e</sup> is my partner <sup>d</sup> and fellow-helper concerning you: or our brethren be inquired of, they are <sup>e</sup> the messengers of the churches, and the glory of Christ.

Note.—The cordiality and diligence of Titus in his attention to the Corinthians, as well as his zeal for the good work in hand, were “put,” or given, “into his heart” by the Lord; whom the apostle heartily thanked for this interposition in his favor. (Marg. Ref. n, o.—Note, Ezra 7:27,28.) Indeed Titus not only complied with his exhortation to return to Corinth, from regard to his authority; but he was so prompt and willing for that service, as not to need solicitation.—The brother who was sent with him is generally supposed to have been Luke, “whose praise was in all the churches,” on account of the gospel which he had written, and for many zealous services in the cause: yet whether this was intended by St. Paul, who would be clearly understood by the Corinthians, is on many accounts uncertain. The brother, however, had been chosen by the churches of Macedonia to travel with the apostle, as their messenger to Jerusalem, with the contributions raised by them; which they were to dispose of, (as the deacons did of the donations of their several churches,) “to the glory of Christ,” the one Lord both of the Jewish and Gentile converts; as the honorable evidence of their ready mind to such good works; and so as to cultivate love with their Jewish brethren by reciprocal kindnesses. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. r—u.) This, the apostle had proposed and accomplished, that he might avoid all censure, and suspicion of injustice or partiality, in the disposal of those large sums of money, which had been raised: and that he might, by a prudent foresight, take care that his whole conduct should appear honorable, consistent, and unexceptionable in the sight of men, as well as that it should really be so in the sight of God. (Marg. Ref. x—z.—Note, Rom. 12:17–21, v. 17.)—With Titus and the brother before-mentioned, he had also sent another of his brethren, whom he had frequently found diligent in other services; but he expected extraordinary diligence from him on this occasion, as he was animated by the confidence in them, which the apostle had expressed. Some think that Apollos is meant; but this is not probable, for he wanted no recommendations to the Christians at Corinth: indeed curiosity rather than edification, is concerned in determining these questions.—If, however, any of them inquired who Titus was, that he should take the lead in this business; as the apostle’s adversaries would be likely to do; (Note, 12:16–21.) let them be answered, that he was “the partner” of the apostle, in the sacred ministry, who cordially united with him in all his designs, and who was particularly helpful to him in the affairs of Corinth. If the other brethren were inquired of; let it be said, that they were the chosen messengers of the Macedonian churches, whose characters, zeal, and conduct in that important service, made them an honor to the gospel, and greatly instrumental in manifesting the glory of Christ. (Marg. Ref. b—e.) It therefore was proper that the Corinthians should show, in their liberality on the present occasion, before these excellent persons, and the churches whom they represented, “the proof of their love” to Christ; and that they deserved those warm commendations, which the apostle had bestowed on them. (Note, 9: 1—5.)—It may here again be observed, that there is not the least reason to doubt, but that the messengers, entrusted with the contributions of the Christians for their Jewish brethren, were chosen by the suffrage of the churches: how then is it, that so little satisfactory scriptural proof can be adduced, that the spiritual pastors were elected in the same manner? (Notes, Acts 6:2—6. 14:21—23. 1 Cor. 16:3, 4.)—“It would have been a most ready calumny against Paul, to have said, that he greatly desired the care of these contributions, that he might sacrilegiously convert the consecrated money to his own use; had he not by every means guarded against it. But who, during these thousand years, and more, has followed this truly apostolical example?” Beza.—Of his own accord. (17) “Here we see the sweet harmony there is betwixt the grace of God, and our persuasion and free will.—Titus was moved to this work, by St. Paul’s exhortation, and was also “willing of his own accord,” and yet “God,” saith the apostle, “put this earnest care into his heart.”” Whitby.—“It is God who worketh in us both to will and to do.” Concerning free will in this sense, we have no controversy.—All men, however their wills are enslaved by their lusts, have free agency.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

By ascribing all “good works” to “the grace of God,” we not only give the glory to him whose due it is; but we also show men where their strength lies, and enable humble believers to read the Lord’s special love to them, in the fruits of their love to him and to his people. (Notes, Luke 7:44—50. 1 John 4:19.)—Abundant spiritual joy not only supports the soul under great trials of afflictions, but it enlarges the heart in “the work and labor of love” so that “the depth of poverty,” in joyful Christians, renders more admirable “the riches of their liberality:” for they do more than could have been conceived in their power, 264] and manifest a still more enlarged good will. How different is this from the conduct of those, who will not concur in any expensive good work, except their reluctance be overcome by an importunity, as uneasy to themselves as to those who solicit them! The happy frame of mind, before described, must spring from an unreserved surrender of ourselves to the Lord, that we may henceforth live to his glory, as well as partake of his salvation; and then, giving up ourselves to the counsels of his faithful ministers, as far as we are satisfied that they instruct us “by the will of God.”—Remarkable examples of piety and charity, should be brought forward, in order to excite others to a holy emulation; especially when the inferiority in outward things, of those who exhibit them, renders it less likely that they should be noticed: and such instances will commonly be found very efficacious to this end, among those who are partakers of divine grace.—Those whom God has employed to begin, will commonly best carry on and finish his work of grace in his people.—Such persons as “abound in faith, knowledge, utterance, fervent affections,” and attachment to pious ministers, should be exhorted to abound proportionably in liberality to their poor brethren: and occasion should be taken, from “the forwardness” of some, to excite others to show their love to be genuine; for nothing can evince this, except the fruits of love, in good works to Christians for the Lord’s sake. (P. O. Matt. 25:31—40.) “The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ” was not declared in kind words only; but “though he was rich, yet for our sakes he became poor; that we through his poverty might be rich:” and they, who truly know and experience the happy effects of his grace, will show their love to him and his people, by good works, and not merely by a cheap profession. But alas! we may easily estimate the small degree, in which most of us “know the grace of Christ;” by considering how small a proportion of our superfluities we retrench, and how little we deny ourselves, submit willingly to privations, forego the prospect of wealth, endure inconveniences, and stoop to men of low estate, from love to his name. Doubtless, this is the proper standard of our spiritual knowledge of Christ. In proportion to our views of his glory, we shall bear his image: and if this change were more fully effected, we should embrace poverty, endure hardship, and even “lay down our lives” for the good of his people, when properly called to it; and at last, we should deem all this as nothing, when compared with our obligations to his infinite love.

V. 10—15.

We may not positively enjoin the proportion, in which Christians should communicate to the relief of the necessitous: yet we may advise them concerning what is becoming, and consistent with their ability, profession, and hopeful beginnings; that their “readiness to will” may be manifested by the performance of it. But, while the wealthy must be charged “to be ready to communicate,” (Note, 1 Tim. 6: 17—19. P. O. 13—21.) the poorer should be encouraged to contribute their help also; yet without being urged to what may distress them: for “if there be first a willing mind, it is accepted.” This is indeed an universal rule: the sinner's "ready mind," to repent, to believe in Christ, to love and obey him, and to do good to others for his sake, springs from divine grace: without this, all external services must be ostentatious and hypocritical: but where this is first produced, the defective attempts of the believer to glorify God will be accepted and graciously rewarded; though in strict justice, according to the perfect and holy law, they merit condemnation.—We should be careful to act impartially in promoting works of charity: one should not be burdened to ease another, but "equality" and reciprocal help should be aimed at. Even among the poor people, in any parish or congregation, the most distressed may be relieved by such as are less straitened, with what they can at present spare; and when they in their turn come to be straitened, their brethren may concur to help them. Thus mutual love will be cemented, and prayers and thanksgivings for each other will be multiplied; and though none will thus have any thing superfluous, yet absolute want may commonly be excluded. But upon a larger scale, and where more wealthy persons are concerned, greater effects may be produced; and the most prosperous may be exhorted to liberality, from the consideration of the vicissitude and uncertainty prevalent in human affairs: nor can riches be secured so effectually, for the benefit of the possessor or his family, as by thus "lending them to the Lord." (Notes, 9:6—11. Prov. 11:24,25. 19:17.)

We ought fervently to love those, who have an earnest care for the welfare of the church, and to be thankful to our benefactors: but the Lord who "put it into their hearts" should be first acknowledged and adored.—It is becoming to show a readiness for difficult and laborious services, and even to render exhortations superfluous, by "a willing mind:" and it is proper to commend what is good in the most candid manner; for this is often the best method of exciting men to redoubled diligence. All our good works should be referred to the glory of the Lord, and be considered, as the evidences of our ready mind to his service.—Whatever disputes may have arisen about the appointment of rulers and officers in the church; it seems indisputable, that men should choose the persons, who are to manage their charitable contributions; though they may be counselled to select those, "whose praise is in all the churches."—When ministers are in any way entrusted with large sums of money; they should be peculiarly careful to avoid all occasion of suspicion, or "appearance of evil." (Note, and P. O. John 12:1—8.) It is indeed in the first place necessary to act uprightly in the sight of God; but "things honest in the sight of men" ought also to be circumspectly "provided for." The world is full of selfishness and enmity to true religion; and suspicions and slanders will be unavoidable, without great prudence as well as exact conscientiousness: whereas a clear character, as well as a pure conscience, is requisite to enlarged usefulness.

When approved, diligent, and faithful men are employed in services evidently conducive to the benefit of mankind, and the glory of God; they are not only honored by their brethren, but their character, conduct, and usefulness is "the glory of Christ," and his gospel is recommended by them. It therefore behoves Christians among whom they labor to respect them, and "to show, before them and the churches" of Christ, "the proof of their love," and of the expectations which have been raised concerning them.

CHAP. IX.

The apostle assigns his reasons for sending the brethren beforehand, to make up the collections of the Corinthians, notwithstanding his confidence in them, 1—5. He encourages their cheerful liberality; under the figure of sowing seed, from which they might expect from God a large increase, to enable them to sow still more abundantly for his glory, 6—11; for such services, not only supply the wants of the saints, but excite them to abundant thank-givings to God, and fervent love to their benefactors, and prayers for them, 12—14. He concludes the subject by "thanking God for his unspeakable gift," 15.

2 For I know <sup>d</sup> the forwardness of your mind, for which <sup>e</sup> I boast of you to them of Macedonia, <sup>f</sup> that Achaia was ready a year ago; and your zeal hath <sup>g</sup> provoked very many.

3 Yet <sup>h</sup> have I sent the brethren, lest our boasting of you should be in vain in this behalf; that, as I said, <sup>i</sup> ye may be ready:

4 Lest haply, if <sup>k</sup> they of Macedonia come with me, and find you unprepared, we (that we say not ye,) should <sup>l</sup> be ashamed in this same confident boasting.

5 Therefore I thought it necessary to exhort the brethren, that they would go before unto you, <sup>m</sup> and make up beforehand your <sup>n</sup> bounty, <sup>o</sup> whereof ye had notice before: that the same might be ready, as a matter of bounty, and not as of covetousness.

Note.—Beza explains the "ministering to the saints," not of the money contributed, but of the office and duty of those persons, who were chosen to take charge of it, and the care of the church at Corinth in selecting them: the context however does not seem to favor this interpretation, at least as exclusive.—The whole transaction, from the first thought and proposal of thus relieving the poor Christians in Judea, to the completion of the design, in the distribution of the money among them, by the apostles and elders at Jerusalem, may be included in this general term. (Notes, 12—15. 8:1—5.) The apostle, however, deemed it "superfluous," for him to write particularly, on the duty and benefits of ministering to the necessities of the saints; as he took it for granted, that the Corinthians were well instructed in this respect, and even "taught by God" himself thus to show love to their brethren. (Notes, 1 Thes. 4:9—12. 1 Pet. 1:22.) He also knew that they were "forward" to concur in the present good work: and accordingly he had spoken of them, with confidence, to the Macedonians; declaring that the Christians in Achaia, (of which Corinth was the capital city,) had been ready with their contributions a year before; and their zeal, in so good a cause, had quickened and excited many, who were before remiss. (Note, 8:10—15.) Yet he had sent Titus and the other brethren to complete the design, lest his boasting of their readiness should be "in vain in that behalf:" for though he did not doubt but they would contribute, yet he feared lest they should not have all things in readiness when he came. And in that case the Macedonians, who accompanied him, would witness this circumstance; which would put him to shame, for having boasted so confidently of them: not to say, that it would tend to their disgrace, for having disappointed the expectations, which had been formed respecting them. (Note, 7:13—16.) He had therefore judged it needful to desire the brethren to go before him to make up their contributions, of which mention had been made before, both to them and the Macedonians; that it might evidently appear to be "bounty," or benefactions willingly bestowed, and not money extorted from them by importunity. (Note, 1 Cor. 16:1,2.)—"The apostle calls that "covetousness," which is done sordidly, and 'as extorted from a covetous person.' Beza.—"To give alms out of shame, or to satisfy the importunity of others rather than out of love 'and good-will, is a symptom of a covetous temper.' Whitby. The word, rendered "bounty," signifies a  blessing: which may either intimate that it should be given as an expression of gratitude to God, and as an act of praise and thanksgiving to him; or that it should spring from love, and a disposition to bless and do good to their brethren.

7 Every man according as he propos-

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The apostle would not prescribe the proportion, which every one ought to give; nor would he write, as one who aimed to extort money from them: but "this he said," that God would measure to them, according to the measure which they should use towards their poor brethren. (Note, Luke 6:37,38.) The seed-corn may to an ignorant person seem to be thrown away; yet this alone yields an increase: the prudent husbandman will not therefore "sow sparingly," for he knows that, in that case, he must expect to "reap sparingly:" but, when the ground is well prepared, it may be expected, that if he "sow liberally" he will receive a proportionable increase. (Marg. Ref. n, o.—Note, Gal. 6:6—10.) Thus, money spent in acts of piety and charity seems, to unbelief and selfishness, finally thrown away: but in fact, when given from proper principles, it is "seed sown," and the only part of a man's substance from which a valuable increase can be expected. God in his providence often frowns upon the undertakings of him who gives sparingly, and by concurring causes keeps him poor: the evidence of his conversion must thus be rendered proportionably dubious: if he be a real Christian, his consolations will be scanty, according to his penurious conduct towards his brethren; and his final recompense will be proportioned to the small measure of his present fruitfulness. But he who "sows bountifully," from gratitude to God and love to man, will in every sense reap a plentiful and bountiful increase. (Notes, 1—5,8—11. Prov. 11:18,24,25. Is. 58:5—12.)—Let then every one determine for himself, how much he would spare from other expenses, or deduct from his accumulating treasure, to sow in this fertile field, from which the word of God insured so large an increase: and let no man do it "grudgingly, or of necessity," merely to keep up his character, or through the importunity of ministers, or Christian brethren: for "God loveth the cheerful giver," and no other; as this is the effect and evidence of his grace, and therefore "well pleasing to him through Jesus Christ."—"Two things are excluded by the apostle, 'namely, grief and necessity,' (Gr.) 'when, for 'instance, any person gives indeed, but with a 'grudging and illiberal mind, or even unwillingly, because he would not be evil spoken of 'among others; else he would not give at all.' Beza.

Note.—The Lord would without fail, in one way or other, make up to the givers what they cheerfully expended in the good work, of which the apostle was speaking: for he was “able to make all grace” or gift of unmerited favor “to abound to them;” that so, “having a sufficiency of all things” desirable for themselves and families, and being enlarged in faith and love, they might have both a willing mind and ability for every good work. (Marg. Ref. r—u.—Note, 1 Pet. 4:9—11.) Thus the character and blessedness, mentioned by the Psalmist, would be verified in them: (Notes, Ps. 112:5—10.) and their acts of kindness to the poor, from love to Christ, would be accepted works of righteousness, of which the benefit would remain with them for ever.—The apostle therefore besought God, who, in his providence, both supplied the husbandman with seed and mankind in general with food, from the increase of the field; (Note, Is. 55:10,11.) that he would provide for their wants, in proportion to their seed sown in acts of liberal love; “multiply” to them the ability of sowing more in the same manner; accompany it with a larger blessing to others; cause them to abound more and more in “the fruits of righteousness;” and give them an increase of comfort in their own souls. (Note, Phil. 4:14—20.) That so, “being enriched in every thing,” they might be enabled “to all bountifulness,” which would occasion numbers to thank God on their behalf; and the apostle would then rejoice to be the instrument of such an honorable and beneficial work. (Marg. Ref. z—d.—Notes, Phil. 1:9—11. Heb. 13:15,16. 1 Pet. 4:8—11.)—The tenth verse may be thus literally translated: “May he who supplieth seed to the sower, and bread for food, supply and multiply your seed, and increase the productions of your righteousness.” The sense is thus rendered more obvious, but it is not materially altered.—The word rendered “seed sown,” more properly signifies “seed for sowing,” that is, enabling those spoken of to sow plentifully for a future harvest, from the increase of that which they had sown before.—He hath dispersed, &c. (9) From the LXX, which accord to the Hebrew. 12 For <sup>e</sup> the administration of this service, not <sup>f</sup> only supplieth the want of the saints, but is abundant also by many thanksgivings unto God.

15 <sup>n</sup> Thanks be unto God for <sup>o</sup> his unspeakable gift.

Note.—The proper administration of the service which was spoken of, by the liberal contribution of believers towards it, and the faithful and prudent application of the sums thus raised, would not only relieve the necessities of the poor saints in Judea, to whose comfort they ought gladly to communicate; but it would also abound “in many thanksgivings to God,” both for the seasonable supply given them, and for his grace bestowed on the Gentile converts. Thus experiencing the comfort of their brotherly love, they would praise and glorify God for bringing them to act so consistently with their “professed subjection unto the gospel of Christ;” and for exciting them to so “liberal a distribution” to their brethren, there and elsewhere. (Marg. Ref. e—i.) At the same time, their brethren, thus seasonably relieved, would glorify God by their fervent prayers in their behalf; and they would very much long to be acquainted with them; because of their admiration of the “exceeding grace of God,” by which so happy a change had been effected in their character and conduct. This last consideration caused the apostle to break out in thanks to God, for the unspeakable grace of the gospel, and the gift of his Son to be the Saviour of sinners; by whom idolatrous Gentiles had been thus brought to glorify him; a foundation had been laid for the mutual love of Jews and Gentiles, as members of one church and children of one family; and the most effectual motives, encouragements, and example, had been afforded, to excite men to “love and good works.” (Marg. Ref. k—n.)—“The admirable charity, by which God is so much glo-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

The duty of "ministering to the saints" is so obvious, that it might be deemed superfluous to exhort Christians to it: yet they are so apt to forget their principles and obligations; and the remains of unbelief and carnal self-love war so powerfully against the "constraining love of Christ" in their hearts; that it is in general necessary "to stir up their minds by way of remembrance." This is often done most effectually, by expressing a favorable opinion of them, and high expectations from them; by commending the forwardness which they have shown on former occasions, and the happy effects of their zeal on the conduct of others: and when we have a prevailing confidence, that the persons addressed are real believers, this will consist with "godly sincerity," and may be considered as true wisdom. (Note, Heb. 6:9—12.)—It is very painful for ministers to be compelled to retract, or excuse, the commendations which their fervent love had bestowed on their people; and when other Christians witness in them a conduct inconsistent with such "confident boastings." Men should be very careful not to shame, or grieve in this manner their faithful pastors; for that will eventually tend to their own deeper disgrace.—Many an intended good work has been neglected, or rendered useless, by delay: it is therefore proper to exhort men to be prompt in doing what they have shown a willingness to engage in. (Notes, Prov. 2:27,28. Ec. 9:10.) Works of piety and charity should flow, spontaneously, as water out of a fountain, from the gratitude and benevolence of a believing heart; and not require extorting by importunity. This savors of "covetousness;" and it even puts those who labor in useful designs, to the painful necessity of endeavoring to draw money from such as ought to give, but are reluctant to part with it. Yet the main benefit of every act of charity, for the Lord's sake, will redound to the giver. (Note, Phil. 4:14—20.) He sows this good seed in a fruitful soil; and his "bountifulness" to man will assure him of the Lord's bountifulness to him. Whatever expenses therefore are retrenched, or from whatever fund it is deducted, we should not grudge or be grieved or sparing, in sowing this seed. It is spiritual policy for us to spend less on every kind of indulgence, and to lay by less for our families, that we may give more to the needy for Christ's sake: for this will be far the best secured and most productive. Even persons in moderate circumstances may sow much of this seed; if by various little savings and self-denials, they will but study to spare something to relieve their distressed brethren; and this they will do, if "faith and love abound in their hearts." With these truths before our eyes, men must be left to "do as they have purposed in their hearts;" for they who give in a reluctant, sorrowful, or grudging manner, and "of necessity," have little reason to expect the acceptance of God, "who loveth a cheerful giver." (Notes, Ec. 11:1—6.)

V. 8—15.

There are a few Christians still to be found "who scatter, and yet increase;" but there are far more, even among those who are zealous for evangelical doctrines, "who withhold more than is meet, and it tendeth to poverty;" for "God is able to make all grace to abound" to those, whose hearts are enlarged with kindness to their brethren; and it should be remembered, that he gives us every thing far more "freely," than we can give alms to the meanest beggar. If he sees it good for us, he can so prosper us, that, "having all-sufficiency in all things, we may abound unto every good work;" and they, who from love to him, "scatter abroad and give to the poor," have "a righteousness that endureth for ever." He can easily give us enough to use and enough to disperse: that we may have more, sow more, and reap more; and so, "increase the fruits of our righteousness;" that, being "enriched in every thing unto all bountifulness," we may be happy in ourselves, blessings to others, and instruments of promot- ing his glory. But alas! the faithfulness of our God, in this respect, is little known, even among professed Christians, because so few fairly venture to make the experiment.—The Lord is pleased to try and purify many of his saints by poverty; and he proves others by employ- ing them as his almoners. Their faithful- ness and liberality, in this service, "not only supply the wants of the saints; but abound" in a large revenue of praise and thanksgiving to God. Their conduct in this respect evinces the sincerity of their own professed subjection to the gospel; and it stirs up many to pray for them, to long after them, and to admire and glorify God for his exceeding grace in them. Thus they adorn the gospel, animate the worship of believers, cement mutual love, and derive abundant blessings unto their own souls. While therefore we thank the Lord for "the unspeakable gift of his Son," to be our gracious Redeemer; through whom we poor sinners may perform such honorable and useful services, with assurance of acceptance and abundant recompense; let us endeavor to copy the example of Christ, by being unwearied in doing good, and by counting it "more blessed to give than to receive." (Notes, Acts 20:32—35. 1 Tim. 6:17—19.)

CHAP. X.

The apostle treats the Corinthians not to leave him any cause to exert his spiritual power, "and the weapons of his warfare," which were mighty through God for men's salvation, in rebuking those who despised his person and ministry, 1—5; assuring them, that when he came, he should be found as powerful in deeds, as he was in writing when absent, 7—11; and contrasting his own conduct, with the ostentatious boasts and ambitious intrusions of the false teachers, 12—18.

2 But I beseech you, <sup>f</sup> that I may not be bold when I am present, with that confidence, wherewith I think to be bold against some, which † think of us as if § we walked according to the flesh.

6 And having <sup>s</sup> in a readiness to revenge all disobedience, <sup>t</sup> when your obedience is fulfilled.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—Having concluded other subjects, the apostle here begins to speak more directly against the false teachers, who opposed him at Corinth. (Note, 11:13—15.) Even he Paul, whom they reviled and despised, as not daring to assert his authority among them, (Notes, 1:15—20. 1 Cor. 4:18—21.) "besought them, by the meekness and gentleness," which Christ, though possessed of "all power in heaven and earth," had exercised towards his enemies, and which he required of his people; not to compel him to adopt measures apparently of a contrary nature. (Marg. Ref. a, b.) Some indeed represented him as mean-spirited and abject, when present among them; for they disdain his lowly appearance and humble unassuming deportment: yet being absent he was bold towards them, and wrote as one who had resolved to vindicate and exert his apostolical authority. But before matters came to this extremity, he besought them, with all meekness and gentleness, not to constrain him to it; that he might not be "bold among them," with that kind of confidence, with which he was determined to proceed against certain persons, who suspected and accused him, of conducting himself with carnal policy, and aiming at secular advantages and distinctions, in the execution of his sacred ministry. In this charge they included his fellow-laborers also; and, by such misrepresentations, they seduced the Christians at Corinth from their attachment to him and them. (Marg. Ref. c—g.—Notes, 12:16—21.) But though he and his coadjutors were liable to the manifold infirmities incident to the present mortal life, and were not exempt from imperfections, as "walking in the flesh," living in the body, and not being yet perfected in holiness: "they did not war" against sin and Satan, or conflict with their numerous opposers, according to the maxims of carnal policy, with craft and dissimulation, in dependence on their own wisdom and strength, or with an aim at their own interest or honor. (Note, 1:12—14.) For "the weapons," which they employed in this spiritual "warfare were not carnal;" nor did they produce the effect by their own natural energy: but they were "mighty through God," whose power wrought by them, to demolish the "strong-holds" of Satan, by which he had maintained his empire of darkness, idolatry, and wickedness in the world. For the preaching of the gospel, confirmed by miracles, and accompanied by the power of the Holy Spirit, pulled down these strong-holds, dispersed Satan's garrisons, delivered his captives, and subverted his authority; by diffusing the knowledge of God and his commandments and salvation among men. (Marg. Ref. k—m.—Notes, 4:7. Josh. 6:3—7. P. O. 1—14. Is. 30:23—25. Jer. 1:9,10. Matt. 12:29,30. Luke 11:21, 22. Rom. 1:13—16. 15:18—21. 1 Cor. 1:20—25. 1 Thes. 1:5—8.) Thus the ministers of Christ went on, casting down men's vain imaginations, presumptuous speculations, and carnal reasonings: exposing the falsehood and folly of that proud philosophy which led to skepticism and atheism, as well as of those fables which supported the stupid idolatry of the populace: and showing also the worthlessness of pharisaical forms and duties, and of every scheme of religion, which flattered men into a good opinion of themselves. So that their doctrine was rendered effectual to "cast down every high thing," every self-confident notion, every proud objection or ambitious purpose; and all that self-sufficiency, impenitence, obstinacy in rebellion, unbelief, and independence of spirit, which "exalted themselves" in men's hearts against the humbling holy knowledge, worship, and service of God; and enslaved men to idolatry, impiety, infidelity, and vice. When these were cast down, and a man was brought to "the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ," (Note, 4:3—6.) and to genuine repentance and faith; he found every imagination, reasoning, affection, and purpose of his heart, captivated by love to his divine Saviour: and, being thus conquered by grace and held captive by love, he became, by a sweet constraint, obedient to his teaching and command; and from his inmost soul, he was thenceforth the willing subject of Christ, in all his ordinances and commandments. (Marg. Ref. n—q.) ‘The soul, seeing its fortifications demolished, submits to the Conqueror; and every thought, every reasoning, takes law from him.—Christ is acknowledged as absolute Master.—The former clause shows, how ready men are to fortify themselves against it; and to raise, as it were, one barrier behind another, to obstruct his entrance into the soul.’ Doddridge.—As no outward miracle could effect this change, without new-creating grace; so we may be sure, that the power of God, in regenerating and renewing the heart, was principally, though not exclusively, intended by the apostle: yet many expositors almost wholly confine it to the miracles wrought by him.—Thus the apostle and his fellow-soldiers waged war against their opposers. By faithful preaching, disinterested labors, patient sufferings, holy lives, and fervent prayers, they sought to change their enemies into friends to them and their divine Master: and thus they prevailed against Satan, to the subversion of his strongholds and the revolt of his subjects.—Yet the apostle had another weapon, to use on some occasions; and this also was “mighty through God,” to avenge his despised authority on his obstinate opposers. For he purposed, and was in readiness, by miraculous judgments, to avenge the cause of Christ on those disguised enemies, who persisted in their disobedience; as he had on Elymas and others: (Note, Acts 13:6—12.) but he waited to bring back such as had been deluded by them to their former obedience, and to complete that work of love, before he proceeded to use severer methods. (Marg. Ref. s, t.)—Many expositors seem to confine the interpretation of these verses almost entirely to the divine power, by which the apostles were enabled to confound all open opposers, as well as to inflict judgments on those professed Christians, who by their persevering misconduct exposed themselves to the censures of the church. But it appears evident, that “the gospel, as the power of God unto salvation,” is primarily intended; and that the conversion of opponents, and the restoring of lapsed Christians to obedience, were the first objects aimed at. But when all proper means had failed in respect of the latter, then not so much the censures of the church, as miraculous punishments denounced by apostolical authority, and made effectual by the power of God, were the weapons to which they had recourse. Note.—Some of the Corinthians had been seduced into an ill opinion of Paul, on account of his mean appearance, indigent circumstances, and exterior disadvantages: but would they continue to regard outward appearances, which had no connexion with real excellency? Or would they value men on account of external accomplishments, plausibility, and self-confidence? If any man, among those who opposed him, was confident, that he was a disciple and minister of Christ; let him consider that Paul and his brethren were so likewise: and then he would perceive, that he had no ground of self-preference. (Marg. Ref. u—y.) Indeed Paul might have boasted something further of his apostolical authority, which the Lord, in his special favor, had given him for “the edification” of the church, and the salvation of souls, and “not for their destruction:” though no doubt, this might be occasioned by it in some instances; but the effect would be contrary to its genuine tendency, and the use which he had made of it. (Note, 2:14—17.) Nor could this claim of pre-eminence, if he had more decidedly advanced it, have made him ashamed: as it was sufficiently authenticated by his miracles, conduct, and success in his ministry; and the effects of it would soon be felt by the refractory party at Corinth. Yet he had rather wave this topic, than enlarge on his power to punish opposers; that he might not appear disposed to terrify them by his epistles. For some ventured to say, that his epistles were written with much apparent weight of argument, and power of conviction, and contained the language of authority and firmness; but that "his bodily presence was weak" and feeble, and his elocution "contemptible." (Marg. Ref. c—d.) —It is recorded, (I determine not how truly,) that the apostle was of low stature, crooked, and bald: some add that he had an impediment in his speech, that his voice was shrill and unpleasant, and his delivery ungraceful. (Notes, 12:7—10. 1 Cor. 2:3—5. Gal. 4:12—16.) However this might be, for probably it is not quite correct, his scrupulous rejection of the studied ornaments of the Grecian eloquence, and his plain, modest, and unaffected address, would render "his speech contemptible with many persons at Corinth" where these decorations were highly valued: though his subjects were ever so judiciously discussed, and his delivery every way suitable to the occasion. Indeed the very meanness of his apparel would render his appearance despised by numbers. But he warned such as ventured to speak thus of him, to expect that he would act as decidedly when he arrived at Corinth, as he now wrote: and would show them, that he was able to assume a firmer tone, and act with more authority, and even severity, when he saw occasion; though he preferred "beseeching them in the meekness and gentleness of Christ." Note.—The favorers of the false teachers, at Corinth, might think it presumption in Paul to rank himself with such wise, eminent, and eloquent men as they were: and he seems in an ironical manner, to refer to this opinion. But he assured them that he could not conscientiously copy their example of ostentatious boastings and self-commendation: for they, by "measuring themselves," and their endowments and performances with their own erroneous judgment of excellency, and with those of each other, and thus "comparing themselves with themselves," without bringing their characters, gifts, and ministry, to the proper standard, plainly proved that they were defective in wisdom and knowledge, and far from the way of attaining them. (Marg. Ref. f.—Notes, Prov. 26:12. Is. 5:21. Luke 18:9—14. Rom. 12:3—5. Phil. 2:1—4.) But the apostle and his friends would not boast of their qualifications or services, in this vague and immeasurable manner; but would speak of them, with reference to the true standard, even that "rule" or line, which marked out the services to which the providence and commandment of the Lord had called them. This "measure," as it respected Paul, "the apostle of the Gentiles," had reached even as far as Corinth. For he had not stretched himself beyond his commission, or left his work in other places from haste to come to them, though not within the line of duty, as the false teachers had done; but, proceeding regularly in his work of preaching the gospel to the Gentiles, he had at length come as far as to them; and had been the first who taught them the way of salvation. (Marg. Ref. g—k.)—It appears from the history, that to this time Achaia had been the boundary of the apostle's labors in Europe.—He did not therefore boast of interfering with services, which lay beyond the line of his present duty, or seek the credit of "other men's labors;" as their false teachers had done, by intruding among them and perverting them. (Notes, Matt. 13:24—30, 36—43. 1 Cor. 3:10—15. Gal. 6:11—14.) On the contrary he hoped, when their faith should be increased even by means of these events, and he could safely leave them to their ordinary teachers, that he should be so "magnified" and helped forward by them, as to proceed with abundant success, to preach the gospel in other parts of the Peloponnesus, or even in the more remote regions of Italy and Spain: according to his rule of laboring for the conversion of the Gentiles, without interfering with the duty marked out to other men or "boasting of things made ready to his hand," as if he had actually performed them. (Note, Rom. 15:18—21.)—'To the apostles God allotted the charge of converting the world; and endued them with gifts suited to the greatness of the work. To them therefore it belonged to form their converts into churches, and to appoint rules for their government. ... The province assigned to the evangelists, and other inferior ministers, was to assist the apostles; to build upon the foundation laid by them; to labor in the gospel under their direction; and in all things to consider themselves as subordinate to the apostles. According to this view of the matter, the false teacher at Corinth, who was but at best an inferior minister of the

Ref. n.—Notes, Jer. 9:23,24. 1 Cor. 1:26—31, vv. 30,31.*)—The apostle was constrained to speak of his own labors and success: but he must remind the Corinthians, that every man who “gloried,” ought “to glory in God,” as his Portion; and in the Lord Jesus as his whole Salvation, and the Giver of all his hopes, grace, endowments, and usefulness; to whom all the honor of them was due. If a man could not thus “glory in the Lord,” all other glorying must be vain-glory, and end in shame and misery. For that man was not to be considered as “approved,” in respect of his Christian profession or ministry, who could speak eloquently and plausibly in his own commendation: but he, to whose faithfulness the Lord himself bare testimony, and whose services he commended, by employing him as his instrument for good to many souls, and by giving him the gracious earnestness of final acceptance and commendation. (Marg. Ref. o—q.)—Many expositors suppose, that the commendation here mentioned was given when God enabled a man to work miracles, or exercise spiritual gifts. But many wrought miracles and prophesied, who were “workers of iniquity;” (Notes, Matt. 7:21—23. 1 Cor. 13:1—3.) and it could not be properly said, that “the Lord commended” them. The evident usefulness of a minister’s labors, is a less equivocal testimony: yet the final account, the “Well done, good and faithful servant,” and “the rejoicing in the testimony of conscience” in the mean while, seem especially intended. (Notes, 1:12—14. 5:9—12. Matt. 25:19—23. 1 Cor. 3:10—15. 4:3—5.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

They who meet with unjust and ungrateful usage from those, to whom they are laboring to do good, should frequently and intensely meditate on “the meekness and gentleness of Christ.” As he was reviled and despised by those, whom he came to save; and among whom he wrought his miracles of love and mercy, “going about doing good;” none need wonder, or be discouraged, at meeting with a similar “contradiction of sinners,” in their work and labor of “love.” (Note, Heb. 12:2,3.) They should then endeavor to go on patiently and quietly, after his example, and to “overcome evil with good;” and, even when constrained by duty to reprove and correct, or to exercise authority with firmness and decision; they should do it with reluctance, show a desire to avoid the painful necessity, and manifest a loving and forgiving spirit, that all may see how dear “the meekness and gentleness of Christ” are to them.—Ministers should be careful to avoid all appearance, and to obviate all suspicion, of “walking according to the flesh;” and those who falsely accuse them of so doing will expose themselves to the displeasure of God. Though encompassed with infirmities and temptations, and subject to manifold imperfections, the servants of Christ are engaged in a warfare which cannot be waged “after the flesh.” Worldly wisdom, affected eloquence, dissimulation, compulsion, angry disputation, slanders, revilings, and ridicule, are carnal weapons: and, however powerful they may seem to numbers, they will be found useless as straw and stubble in this war; and rather fortify and garrison Satan’s strong-holds, than pull them down. For success against the kingdom of darkness must be expected, “not from might, or power, but from the Spirit of God.” The appointed means, however feeble they appear to unbelief, will be “mighty through God.” His power, accompanying the blowing of trumpets at his command, cast down the walls of Jericho far more speedily and entirely than any engines of war could have demolished them. And “the preaching of the cross,” by men of faith and prayer, has always been most fatal to the strong-holds of idolatry, infidelity, impiety, and wickedness. Men may, if they be able, give energy to means of their own inventing; while Satan derides their puny efforts, and “takes them captive at his will.” But God works by his own appointments: by his power the enemy is driven from his fortifications, men’s “imaginings” are cast down, their “reasonings” and objections silenced, their pride abased, their illusions dissipated; the knowledge of God finds admission into the mind; reverential fear, repentance, humility, faith, love, and gratitude follow; and the whole soul, with all its faculties and operations, is at length “captivated to the obedience of Christ." Thus he makes "his people willing in the day of his power," and gradually perfects them in obedience and in the beauties of holiness. Yet while the gracious Saviour is ever ready to forgive, and delights in mercy; he is "in readiness to avenge the disobedience" of the impenitent and unbelieving, especially that of hypocrites and false teachers, who corrupt the church and dishonor his name; and he will at length "make them as a fiery oven in the day of his wrath."

It is peculiarly unsuitable to the character of Christians, though lamentably common, to judge of men, or look upon things, after "the outward appearance:" as if learning, eloquence, affluence, a graceful person and address, or elegant attire, were evidences of a man's holiness and heavenly wisdom, or the seal of Christ to his ministerial character! Or as if the want of such embellishments proved a man not to be an eminent Christian, or an able faithful minister of the lowly Saviour! Even Paul was "base," in the judgment of the self-sufficient and accomplished Corinthians: and though "his letters were weighty and powerful, yet his bodily presence was weak, and his speech contemptible;" so that Satan's emissaries far excelled him in exterior recommendations. This should teach us not to judge of gold merely by its glitter, in which tinsel often exceeds it; but to bring it to the balance and weigh it.—When professors or preachers of the gospel are so confident that they belong to Christ, that they can hardly allow those who do not coincide in their views, or sanction their conduct, to be Christians; and when they treat the most approved characters with supercilious contempt and revilings; their very confidence should excite our suspicions: for it far more accords to that of "the deceitful workers" at Corinth, than to that of St. Paul and his fellow-laborers, which was modest, humble, and candid. The great apostle of the Gentiles, when constrained to mention "the authority, which the Lord had given him, for edification and not for destruction," and which he used in the most wise and excellent manner, and with the most blessed success; spake of it with reserve, lest he should seem to boast, or to threaten. Whereas some men appear to be entirely out of their element, when they are not boasting of themselves, and menacing divine judgments on all who oppose them; as if they would terrify every one into silence and submission. Let us not "dare to make ourselves of that number," or "to compare ourselves with those who thus commend themselves:" let us leave them to expose their own want of wisdom, humility, and charity, by "measuring themselves by themselves," and all other men by their own standard; "boasting of themselves, without measure" or decency; "intruding into other men's labors," "glorying in things made ready to their hands," and neglecting their own work, that they may spoil that of other men. But we should humbly "compare ourselves" with the word of God, and the example of prophets and apostles; and "measure ourselves by the rule" of our duty, the obligations conferred upon us, and the work assigned us: we should be diligent, and "study, yea be ambitious, to be quiet and mind our own business," though in an obscure situation; and thankful for success, according to the measure and rule which God has distributed to us; whether called to preach the gospel, or to serve Christ in any other way; without intermeddling with other men's labors, or boasting in services performed by them. We ought likewise to hope for the increase of the faith and grace, even of those who have most failed in their duty to us; to be zealous and bold, in a humble, patient, prudent, loving, and self-denying manner, and rather to be desirous of doing abundant good, than of acquiring great reputation. Finally, let us remember to glory in the Lord our Salvation, and in all other things, only as evidences of his love, or as means of promoting his glory: and, instead of commending ourselves, or seeking the praise of men; let us desire and aspire after "that honor, which cometh from God only."

CHAP. XI.

The apostle excuses his self-commendation; because he used it out of "godly jealousy" over those at Corinth, whom he had espoused to Christ; lest false teachers should pervert them, as Satan did Eve, 1—3. Their new teachers had not preached another Saviour, or another Spirit, or another gospel, than he had done, 4. He was not at all inferior to the "chiefest apostles;" for though "rude in speech," he was not so "in knowledge," 5. He declined being chargeable to the Corinthians, not from want of love, but to counteract his opposers, 7—12; who were "false apostles, ministers of Satan," though apparently "ministers of righteousness," even as "Satan transforms himself into an angel of light," 13—15. As many gloied, and were borne with, even while over-hearing and rapacious; he would, though reluctantly, "glory also," 16—20. A most extraordinary account of his abundant labors, dangers, sufferings, and deliverances, 21—33.

thoroughly made manifest among you in all things.

Note.—The apostle admitted, that in general self-commendation implied folly: yet the case required it of him at that time; and his zeal for the honor of Christ, as well as his love to souls, rendered him an exception to ordinary rules. He therefore desired and prayed, that the Christians at Corinth might show a disposition “to bear with him a little,” in what they deemed “his folly:” he must, however, venture all consequences; and they must bear with him, whether they approved or disapproved of it. (Marg. Ref. a—c.) For he was “jealous over them, with” that fervent love and anxious solicitude for their welfare, which sprang from zeal for the glory of God and regard to his authority. He had solicited and obtained their consent, to that sacred and blessed union with Christ, which might be called their espousals to the One “Bridegroom” and Husband of the church; to whom alone they devoted, faithful, and obedient affection belonged, and from whom all their felicity should be expected. He therefore feared every thing, which tended to alienate, weaken, and divide their attachment to him; or pollute them, either in body or mind: for his ambition was to present them to Christ at last, “holy, unblamable, and unreprouvable in his sight;” as “a chaste virgin” is presented to her intended husband, when the marriage is completed. (Marg. Ref. d—g.—Note, Eph. 5:22—27.) But he feared lest, by any means, the false teachers should draw them aside from simple dependence on Christ and obedient love to him, into a false confidence, carnal affections, or disobedience. Lest they should be deluded from that purity of doctrine, that spiritual frame of mind, and that honorable conduct, which became this high relation: even “as Eve” in Eden, was beguiled by Satan, in the form of a serpent, to seek happiness in departing from God, and disobeying him; being deceived by specious and subtle pretences and insinuations. (Marg. Ref. h—l.—Notes, Gen. 3:1—6. Rev. 12:7—12, v. 9.) The Corinthians were peculiarly exposed to this danger, from those who puffed them up with an idea of their extraordinary knowledge; and seduced them, by artful reasonings, to seek liberty and pleasure in other things, besides obeying God, and walking with him. Indeed, if any man could possibly have preached “another Jesus,” a more gracious and precious Saviour than Paul had declared to them; or could have conferred on them “another Spirit,” whose gifts and influences were more excellent than those, which the Holy Spirit, through Paul’s ministry, had bestowed on them; or if “another” and more suitable “gospel had been preached, than that which they had embraced;” there might have been some reason for their bearing with the new teachers, or even preferring them. Yet, even in that case, it would have become them, to have borne with the infirmities of their first instructor in Christianity. But the contrary was manifest: for, whatever they might think, he was conscious that he was in no respect inferior to any of the apostles, without excepting Peter, James, or John who seemed to be the chief of them all: (Marg. Ref. m—p. Note, Gal. 2:6—10.) he might, therefore, well be confident, that their new teachers could add nothing valuable to the instructions which he had given. He had indeed appeared among them “rude in speech,” and as a person of ordinary education, ignorant of the rules of eloquence, and careless respecting them: (this might be the case, though his discourses were replete with natural pathos, and sound argument;) yet he had shown himself competent in knowledge, to instruct his hearers in every part of Christianity.—St. Paul’s declaration, that he “was not a whit behind the very chiefest apostles,” when carried to its consequences, is totally subversive of the enormous baseless fabric of popery; which rests entirely (as distinguished from the rest of the professed Christian church,) on the vain imagination, that Peter was supreme over all the apostles; and that the pope, or the Roman church, or both, inherit in some unaccountable manner, and by some unknown title, that supremacy.—Many expositors suppose, that the expressions, used by the apostle in respect of his espousing the believers at Corinth to Christ, are taken from Grecian customs; but the language of the Old Testament seems referred to. (Notes, Ps. 45:9—17. Cant. 1:2. Is. 54:5—10. 62:1—5. Ez. 16:9—14. Hos. 2:18—20. John 3:27—36, v. 29.) Others conclude, that one false teacher, and he a Jew, was the author of the disturbances at Corinth. But the false teachers (Note, 13—15.) seem to have corrupted the gospel rather with heathenism, than Judaism. (Notes, 1 Cor. 5: 6: 8: 10:18—31. 11:17—34.)

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The new teachers at Corinth were distinguished from the apostle, by what they received, as well as what they imparted. But would the church be offended with him, because he had “abased himself;” in working as a tent-maker for his maintenance, and submitting to many privations and self-denials, that they might “be exalted” to the privileges of God’s people, by his preaching the gospel to them, without putting them to any expense? (Marg. Ref. t.) Indeed he had done this, lest he should prejudice their minds; and he might, in some sense, be said even to have “robbed other churches,” by receiving money of them for his subsistence, while he was laboring for the benefit of the Corinthians. And when he had really been in want among them, he neither ceased from his ministry through discouragement, nor yet put them to any charge: but the Christians from Macedonia, especially from Philippi, supplied him with what was absolutely necessary. (Marg. Ref. x—z.—Note, Phil. 4:10—20.) Thus “in all things he had kept himself from being burdensome to them;” nay, he saw cause to determine that he would continue to do so: and as surely as “the truth of Christ was in him;” and he faithfully preached it; (Note, 1:23,24,) he was resolved, that no man, by intreaties, arguments, or reproaches, should ever take from him this ground of glorying; and that he would receive nothing towards his maintenance, from any one through all the regions of Achaia. If the reason of this fixed purpose were demanded, or if any should impute it to his want of love; he would appeal to God, who well knew his tender affection for them. (Marg. Ref. a—c.—Note, 12:11—15.) But, indeed, he was resolved to proceed in his present conduct, that he might deprive those of the “occasion” of slandering him, who were ready to seize on every handle against him; (Note, 5:9—12.) and to set them a good example, that, in respect of zeal for the honor of Christ and love of the church, in which they gloried, they might be shown in what manner to make good their pretensions; and learn, that the self-denial and disinterestedness of the apostle constituted a far more unequivocal evidence of zeal and affection, than their plausible harangues, joined with a selfish and domineering conduct. (Marg. Ref. d—f.—Note, Acts 20:32—35.)—It is generally supposed, that the false teachers affected the praise of preaching the gospel freely: but the language, which the apostle afterwards uses, clearly proves that this was not the case (20). They seem rather to have despised Paul, as degrading himself, and as acting inconsistently with the dignity of an apostle, in laboring, and enduring poverty, instead of demanding a maintenance.—As Corinth was a rich city, his long continuance there might have been ascribed to mercenary motives, had he not adopted this plan: (Note, 1 Cor. 9:1—23.) and as the Christians in Macedonia, though far poorer than the Corinthians, yet in part maintained the apostle when laboring at Corinth; it might in some sense be said, that they were robbed to exalt their more prosperous brethren.

Note.—It was not to be expected that the persons, to whom St. Paul referred, would in this respect be found like him: as they were indeed “false apostles,” who in a lying manner pretended to be sent by Christ; in this and other things “working deceitfully,” acting with duplicity, and varnishing over their hypocrisy and selfish intentions, by specious professions; so that their style, manner, and conduct were an affected imitation of those of the apostles; but their ministry tended to dishonor God, and to deceive souls. 13:1—16. 2 Pet. 2:1—3.) Nor need it excite wonder, that such wicked men should be so specious in their appearance and pretensions; for even Satan, their master, could disguise himself, and tempt men in the form of a holy angel, a messenger from the world of light, instead of appearing as the prince of darkness. (Marg. Ref. m, n.—Notes, Matt. 4:3,4. 16: 21—23. Gal. 1:6—10.) He can delude men with professions of extraordinary illumination, high affections, evangelical truth, revelations, singular sanctity, deadness to the world, austerity, or sublimity of devotion, and in various other ways: that so he might undermine or disgrace the whole religion of Christ; hurry men into absurdities and extravagances; lead them to neglect the plain rule of the written word; and change them into enthusiasts, antinomians, or superstitious formalists. It was not therefore “any thing great,” or difficult, or “marvellous,” that “his ministers should be transformed,” and assume the appearance of “the ministers of righteousness;” that by them this chief deceiver might impose on men to their destruction: for if they appeared openly, as opposers of the gospel and patrons of vice and impiety, they could not do near so much mischief: even as depredators succeed best, when disguised like honest men, and reputed to be such. But, whatever their professions might be, and however they might be admired and applauded; yet their end would accord, not to their popularity, confidence, eloquence, or sentiments; but to their works, their conduct in the sight of God, and the effect of their principles among men. (Note, Matt. 7:15—20.)—The plural number used in these verses, in which the apostle directly speaks out on a subject, to which he had all along covertly referred, does by no means favor the opinion, that one false teacher was exclusively meant; though one might possess greater influence than the others.

[Practical Observations.]

He desired that no one would “think him a fool,” or a vain-glorious man, on account of what he said in his own behalf, when the importance of the occasion peremptorily demanded it of him: yet, if they would form so unfavorable a conclusion, let them at least receive him in that character, while “he boasted himself a little,” for a short time, and as to a few things in which he was really distinguished: for he sought their good, and not his own credit, in what he said. He did not indeed speak on this occasion, according to the general precepts or example of the Lord, or what was proper to be imitated in ordinary cases; nor was it an immediate revelation which he was about to declare: but he followed that “same confidence of boasting,” which their conduct had imposed upon him, and which the example of some among them seemed to authorize; though they would perhaps deem it foolish in him to do it. As, however, many of them, both the deceivers and the deceived, were in this habit of “glorying after the flesh,” “he would glory also:” but on other grounds and in another manner, in order to counteract the pernicious tendency of their vain confidence. (Marg. Ref. x.)—Well satisfied with their own wisdom, they were accustomed to bear, with a self-complacent joy, the conduct of those who acted foolishly; and had, no doubt, often looked down on him with this mixture of pity and contempt. (Note, 1 Cor. 4:6—13.) Yet they had not greatly shown their wisdom, in bearing with the false teachers: for they endured it without complaint, at least without being undeceived, if any one brought them into an abject dependence on him, and enslaved their consciences to his unwarranted impositions: if he devoured their substance, (as the Pharisees did the widows’ houses,) by exorbitant demands under covert specious pretexts; if he took money from them by way of presents; if he exalted himself, as some absolute ruler over them, and behaved in the most insolent manner; nay, if he even smote them on the face, as treating them with contempt and disdain, in his ungoverned passions. Doubtless, this refers to facts known to the apostle, in which the violent, litigious, ambitious, selfish, temper, of “the false apostles,” had been evident to all men: yet they were still allowed to retain their influence, through the fascination of their eloquence, and confidence, and the crafty management of their deluded admirers! (Marg. Ref. z—c.—Note, Matt. 5:38—42.)—Glory after the flesh.] This is by most expositors, without any proof, explained of the false teachers glorying in their Jewish extraction, and in circumcision. But the expression, “after the flesh,” according to the apostle’s language, implies every thing which an unregenerate man can possess; so that learning, eloquence, and various other distinctions may be meant; whether Jewish extraction and circumcision be included or not. Note.—The apostle referred, in what he had said, to the reproach, which these deceivers had cast on him and his friends; as if he had been weak and timid in his conduct at Corinth. They ascribed his modesty, meekness, and self-abasement, to a want of courage, or to a consciousness that he had no apostolical authority, and no power to enforce his decisions. Yet in whatever particular any man was bold, as a Christian, a minister, or an apostle, "he was bold also." This he must maintain, though he thus did what on other occasions would be foolish. Commentators generally suppose that in what follows, he meant to compare himself with the false teacher, or teachers, at Corinth; and infer, that these were Hebrews, and wanted to impose the law on the Gentile converts; of which no trace is found in either epistle. (Note, 12:17—21.) But I apprehend that the whole passage will appear far more natural and animated, if we understand it with reference to "the very chiefest of the" true "apostles;" and the words, "whereinsoever any is bold," obviously lead to this interpretation. (Note, 1—6.) It would have been a very small matter for him to show, that he was superior to the "ministers of Satan," whom he had just condemned. But in order to re-establish completely his apostolical authority, he must prove, that he was not "a whit behind the chiefest apostles;" and in fact he here shows, that he labored and suffered more abundantly than they all, or than any of them did. (Note, 1 Cor. 15:3—11, vv. 10,11.) All the apostles were descended from Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. They were neither Hellenists nor proselytes; and Paul was not inferior to them in this respect; though his birth at Tarsus might give some persons occasion to conclude that he was. (Marg. Ref. g, h.—Note, Phil. 3:1—7.) He had declared that his opposers at Corinth were not "ministers of Christ," but of Satan; (Note, 13—15.) and he could scarcely seem to speak "foolishly," in magnifying his office, and declaring that he was more than they: but it had indeed this appearance, when he proceeded to show, that in some respects he was more distinguished, as the minister of Christ, than any other person, even among the apostles themselves: not by superior authority, abilities, miraculous powers, zeal, or holiness; but by his more abundant labors and sufferings, in which he evidently far exceeded all other "ministers of Christ" on earth. The false apostles had labored comparatively very little; and, instead of suffering for the gospel, it is very probable that they had risen to eminence, affluence, and authority by means of it: but by thus showing himself, in these things, to be distinguished above all the other apostles, he tacitly pointed out to the false teachers and their followers, in what true pre-eminence consisted; and by the contrast made it appear, that those things, in which they gloried, were indeed their shame. (Marg. Ref. i—m.—Note, Matt. 20:24—28.)—I speak as a fool. (23) "I speak, as one exceeding in folly." This confirms the above interpretation.—In prisons, &c.] (*Marg. Note.—The other apostles had indeed been scourged and imprisoned for Christ's sake, (Notes, Acts 4:1—3. 5:17—25,40.) yet Paul had endured this pain and disgrace "more frequently" than they, and had been in danger of death on far more occasions. The Jews had scourged him five times, with the utmost severity of which their law and custom allowed; for they were forbidden to exceed forty stripes, and for fear of a mistake, they always confined themselves to thirty-nine. (Note, Deut. 25:2,3.) He had also been thrice scourged by the command of the Roman magistrates, though contrary to their law. (Notes, Acts 16:19—40.) He had once been stoned, and left for dead; but had been miraculously restored to life. (Notes, Acts 14:19,20. 2 Tim. 3:10—12.) He had thrice been shipwrecked in his different voyages; and at one time he continued a night and a day in the sea, probably on a part of the wreck, in much suffering and peril. This was previous to his voyage to Rome, when he was again shipwrecked. (Notes, Acts 27:) Indeed, his other sufferings, recorded in the Acts of the apostles, from the nineteenth chapter to the end, were subsequent to the writing of this epistle: and hence we may perceive, how very many of his trials and sufferings, as well as of his labors, with the success of them, are no where recorded, save in the book of God's remembrance.—He often journeyed from one region to another amidst hardships and perils: sometimes his life had been endangered in passing rapid rivers, or deep waters, which lay in his way; sometimes by robbers, who attempted to plunder and murder him. (Marg. Ref. t.—Notes, Acts 20:1—6.) Frequently the Jews assaulted him, being enraged by his preaching to the Gentiles; then the Gentiles attempted to slay him, because his doctrine undermined their idolatry. (*Marg. Thus his life was spent in weariness, pain, and suffering; his incessant labor in preaching the gospel, conversing with the people from house to house, writing his epistles, earning his bread, and attending to his devotions, frequently forced him to pass whole nights without rest. Often he was exposed to hunger and thirst through extreme indigence; and when he had food, his labors and religious duties led him to abstain from it. He was sometimes exposed to cold, from the inclemency of the weather, and want of proper accommodations; and often had not suitable and decent raiment to cover him, when he was called to appear in public. Yet he still persevered without fainting, in his

Note.—Beside the things above mentioned, which "were without," and mainly related to the apostle's bodily sufferings; his mind was worn down by a multiplicity of affairs, which came upon him daily, with the force of a multitude; by the care of all the churches of the Gentiles planted by him and others. This lay upon him, filled him with constant solicitude, and employed him perpetually, in forming and executing plans, to promote their peace and prosperity, to counteract the designs of false teachers, and to order all their concerns for the best. (Marg. Ref. d, e.) And in this he so cordially engaged, that he was attentive to the case even of individuals: so that he might ask, What single Christian in all the churches was reported to him, as weak in the faith, and liable to be discouraged, with whom he did not sympathize as "weak also?" or who was stumbling and turned aside; and he was not fired with zeal to recover him, and with a holy indignation against those who occasioned the evil? (Marg. Ref. f, g.) As it was become necessary for him "to glory;" so he had taken care, in glorying, not to expatiate on his gifts, or the honors which he had received; but on those things which showed his exposed, despised, and suffering condition; the infirmities of his body and mind; his continual need of divine support; his persecutions, reproaches, and deliverances, and such things as implied his weakness, and "the power of Christ which rested on him." Nor did he in this at all exceed strict truth, as those who gloried were apt to do: for "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," to whom the glory and praise belonged of all that was done by him and for him, was witness that he did not lie in any particular, or in any measure. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.

The ministers of the gospel must on some occasions submit to the imputations of “folly,” rather than omit any thing which is requisite for the good of souls; and when their hearers think their conduct in particular cases indiscreet, they should bear with them; especially if it evidently spring from an excess of zeal and love. They may be “jealous over” the people, with such an affectionate earnestness, as carries them beyond ordinary rules or personal considerations; while they apprehend that their beloved children are in danger of being, by any means, “corrupted from the simplicity of Christ:” and that conduct, which many censure, may be the effect of pure and holy affections superior to those of other men. It is their grand employment and object, to promote the espousals of souls to Christ; and to preserve those, who appear to be thus espoused, from corruption in their principles, spirit, or conduct; that they may “present them as a chaste virgin unto Christ.” This will excite in them a jealous fear, lest Satan, who in “the serpent by his subtlety beguiled Eve” in paradise, should deceive them also. For he has agents of all descriptions, who are continually and artfully imposing upon the unstable and unwary. If then the faithful minister seem over suspicious, and become troublesome by his watchfulness and warnings; his people ought notwithstanding to bear with him.—When any are about voluntarily to leave those pastors, by whom they seem to have been espoused to Christ; they ought to inquire, Whether their new favorites can preach another Jesus, another Sanctifier, or another gospel, than those which they have already received. And they should not endure those who, without sufficient cause, would alienate them from the instruments of God in their conversion.—Christians need not wonder, if confident persons represent their faithful pastors as inferior preachers, who are destitute of erudition, eloquence, and power; or in some respects exceptionable or erroneous: as there were not wanting “deceivers,” who confidently said the same things of blessed Paul himself. But it is far better to be “rude in speech, yet not in” spiritual and experimental “knowledge;” and to be manifested thoroughly in all things, as walking consistently with the gospel, than to be admired by thousands for “excellency of speech;” and to be lifted up in pride, to corrupt the church with heresies, to distract it by furious contentions, and disgrace the gospel, by fierce or malignant tempers and an unholy life. So exceedingly injudicious are many professed Christians, that high confidence, and the language of importance and authority, often go further than the most humble, meek, unassuming, and disinterested deportment! The minister, who is content to be poor, to fare hardly, to “be abased,” or to earn his bread, that he “may exalt others” by freely preaching the gospel to them; is often consigned to neglect as if guilty of some great offence! While others who assume a magisterial tone, and exalt themselves, are admitted to that consequence which they assume; provided they have popular abilities, whatever their character in other respects may be. Yet it is in reality an honor to endure want; without ceasing to labor, or desiring to “become chargeable,” where it might prejudice men against the gospel. On some occasions, a man should determine not to be deprived of “this glorying;” especially if he at any time judge himself required to mention it. Thus the “appearance of evil” may be avoided, the mouths of gainsayers may be stopped, an edifying example may be exhibited, and a contrast made to the conduct of mercenary deceivers. This, however, must be done in love and humility, and as in the presence of God: and it may sometimes be proper to show, that it does not result from pride, by receiving the kindness of others with grateful acknowledgments, where the same reasons do not operate. (Notes, 2 Kings 5:15,16,20—25. 8:9.) It often happens in this way, that ministers “receive wages,” as it were, from one set of people, to do service for another: and sometimes the poorer are at the expense of maintaining those who preach to the rich. But the minister needs not scruple this, as if “he robbed other churches:” it reflects no dishonor on him, provided he only receive a decent subsistence; and it will redound to the credit and profit of those who thus supply him: yet when rich professors of the gospel know this to be the case, they are not even just if they do not bear the burden themselves; nor generous if they do not copy so noble an example.

V. 13—20.

Whatever fair show deceivers may make, they will seldom even appear like faithful ministers, in laboring without any hope of worldly advantage or honor, from pure love to Christ and the souls of men. This is a part of the apostolical character and office, which by no means accords to the designs of “false apostles

o Josh. 2:13. 1 Sam. 19:12.

and deceitful workers.”—The plausibility of deceivers, and the attractive form which they assume, to seduce men “from the simplicity of Christ,” should not excite our wonder; for Satan is continually “transformed into an angel of light,” that, under the most specious pretences, he may fill the earth with infidelity, heresy, and ungodliness: and under the mask of philosophy, morality, or extraordinary austerity, superstition, enthusiasm, or new revelations, he does far more extensive and permanent mischief, than merely by tempting men to gross enormities. It might therefore have been previously supposed, that some of “his ministers transformed into ministers of righteousness,” would be inspired to copy his example; but, if “their end” were to be according to their abilities, confidence, or notions, they would have a far better prospect before them than they now can have, when it must be “according to their works.” If then any of them could indeed vacate the law of God, the rule of duty, and the standard of sin and holiness, they would secure an important point; but they will find it in full force at the day of judgment: the believer’s works, as evidential of his faith and love, will be tried and approved by it; and they, who have habitually done evil under the profession of the gospel, will be condemned as hypocrites. But there is an equal danger on the other side, and it serves Satan’s purposes nearly as well, to set up good works against the righteousness and atonement of Christ, and against salvation by faith and grace. In short, the ministers of Satan will be permitted to preach any doctrine, except the holy law of God, as established by faith in Christ, by regeneration and sanctification of the Holy Spirit: but this is the bane of every false system, and, when clearly exhibited, detects Satan, however “transformed into an angel of light.”—We have great reason for thankfulness, that the apostle was constrained, though with many retractations, to “boast himself a little:” for, whatever he might fear, or his enemies might say, his “confidence in boasting” has thrown such light on his ministry, character, and history, as will be instructive to the church to the end of the world. Doubtless the Holy Spirit guided his pen, though he seemed not to “speak after the Lord;” for he did not glory in a carnal, a proud, or a false manner, as many do. Had the Corinthians been as wise as they thought themselves, he would have had no occasion to apologize to them for his conduct; for he did not require those indulgences, which they granted to their false teachers.—Indeed if faithful ministers, who flatter no man, and pay no court to any man’s passions, should attempt to treat their people, as some do, who for their own ends are in other things more complaisant, it would never be endured. It is astonishing, to see how some men bring their followers into bondage; how “they devour and take of them;” how they insult and reproach them, as well as others; and yet how all this is borne with, excused, or palliated. For indeed their doctrine suits the lives and consciences of their hearers, and their example encourages them to similar conduct towards others. Sometimes it may be necessary to take notice of the reproaches of such men, but we must never imitate their spirit or conduct.

What mere man ever united such and so many grounds “of glorying,” as this apostle did? How does it fill our minds with astonishment, to meditate on this brief enumeration of his labors, hardships, perils, and sufferings, during a long course of years; of his patience, perseverance, diligence, cheerfulness, and usefulness, in the midst of them; and of his attentive and fervent affection towards all the churches, and every individual believer! Next to the history of Christ himself; the dangers, persecutions, cruelty, and treachery, which this most excellent and most useful servant of God, every where, and from all sorts of persons, met with; and the unkindness even of his own converts, form the severest stricture on the folly and wickedness of mankind, that ever was published.—We may here see what are the chief preferences in the true church of Christ: and we may ask ourselves, Whether on such terms we should be willing to be “not a whit behind the very chiefest apostles.” In this glass our utmost diligence and services appear too minute to be noticed, and our difficulties and trials can scarcely be perceived: the prospect may well shame us out of all our boastings and complaints; and lead us to inquire, whether we be really engaged in the spiritual warfare, or are only called the soldiers of Christ. Here we may study patience, fortitude, meekness, and perseverance in well-doing; and confidence in God to protect, deliver, and comfort us, in every possible suffering or danger. Here we may learn to think less of our own ease, interest, indulgence, or reputation; and more of the great concerns of godliness; and to sympathize with the lighter sorrows of our brethren, even when more heavily afflicted ourselves. Here we may look, till poverty, reproach, hunger, thirst, watchings, fastings, cold, nakedness, stripes, and imprisonment, appear honorable; and even special privileges, when sustained in a good cause, and with a constant mind. Here we may learn to be content with food and raiment, thankful for mean and scanty provisions, indifferent about all worldly things, ardently desirous of doing good to others, and animated with the hope of success in this work, notwithstanding our manifold infirmities. These we should especially look at, if we are ever constrained to glory: we should ever keep in view our obligations to the Lord, from whom all our distinctions are received; we should strictly adhere to truth, as in his presence; and we should refer all to his glory, as “the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who is blessed for evermore.”

CHAP. XII.

The apostle relates extraordinary revelations made to him; which had rendered such humiliating and distressing experiences necessary, as constrained him to glory, only in his own infirmities and trials, and in the all-sufficient power and grace of Christ, 1—10. As his apostleship had been fully proved, the Corinthians ought to have commended him, and not to have compelled him to self-commendation, 11—13. He was about to visit them again; but was determined to adhere to his disinterested conduct; and to spend himself in fervent love to them, though they should on that very account love him the less, 14, 15. He shows that those, whom he had sent to them, had acted in the same disinterested manner, 16—19; and expresses his fears, that he should be humbled, as well as compelled to use severity, by finding many who had grossly offended, and had not repented, 20, 21.

2 I <sup>d</sup> knew a man <sup>e</sup> in Christ about fourteen years ago, (whether <sup>f</sup> in the body, I cannot tell; or whether out of the body, I cannot tell: <sup>g</sup> God knoweth;) such an one <sup>h</sup> caught up to the <sup>i</sup> third heaven.

3 And I knew such a man, (whether in the body, or out of the body, I cannot tell: God knoweth.)

4 How that he was caught up into <sup>k</sup> paradise, and heard unspeakable words, which it is not <sup>l</sup> lawful for a man to utter.

<sup>c</sup> For though <sup>n</sup> I would desire to glory, I shall not be a fool: for <sup>o</sup> I will say the truth: but now I forbear, lest any man should think of me <sup>p</sup> above that which he seeth me to be, or that he heareth of ure.

Note.—The peculiarity of the apostle's circumstances rendered that conduct necessary, which otherwise would not have been "expedient," or conducive to general profit; and which, it is probable, his opposers would censure, or even deride. (Marg. Ref. a, b.) He would, nevertheless, proceed to speak concerning "visions" of the divine glory, and "revelations" of heavenly things.—It may be supposed, that the false teachers at Corinth made high pretensions in these matters: and insinuated that Paul was not distinguished by them as the other apostles were.—In mentioning the extraordinary vision, or revelation, here recorded, he modestly spoke in the third person; but there can be no doubt that he meant himself. He "knew a man in Christ," (Marg. Ref. e.) who fourteen years before had most extraordinary visions. Whether he was "in the body, or out of the body," at the time, God alone knew: but his outward senses were entirely closed, and his whole perception was immediately by the powers of his mind: but whether heavenly things were brought down to him, so to speak, as his body lay entranced; (as the case often seems to have been with the ancient prophets;) or whether his soul was dislodged from the body, for the time, and actually taken up into heaven; or whether he was taken up in body and soul together, he knew not. (Marg. Ref. f.—Notes, Ez. 8:2—4. 11:22—25. Acts 8:56—40. Rev. 4:1—3.)—This language evidently proves, that the apostle most firmly believed the soul to be distinct from the body, and capable of perception, activity, and enjoyment, in a state of separation. (Notes, 1 Thes. 5:23—28, v. 23.)—However these things might be, this man was suddenly "caught up into the third," or the highest "heaven;" above the lower region of the air, and the starry heavens, to the place, where the Lord immediately reveals his presence and glory, and receives the adoration of his heavenly hosts. Yea, this man, with whom he was so intimately acquainted, was "taken up into Paradise," the place of felicity, of which Eden was the type; and there heard such words as man could not speak if he might, and as it would be unlawful to speak if he could; it being the purpose of God, that the discoveries made of himself in that glorious world, should not be more fully declared on earth than they had been.—Many approved commentators suppose these to have been two distinct visions; that Paradise is a different place from "the third heaven;" that in the latter, he saw Jesus at the right hand of the Father; and in the former he conversed with departed saints. But, as the happiness of the "spirits of just men made perfect," consists in being "present with the Lord," there seems to be no scriptural ground for this distinction. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 5:5—8. Luke 23:39—43. Phil. 1:21—26.) The language is indeed varied, yet only one vision appears to be intended; but in that one vision he doubtless had "abundance of revelations."—"Of this man," who was so highly favored, at least equally with any of the ancient prophets, "he would glory;" though in himself, as to any thing which was properly his own, "he would not glory, except in his infirmities." In his present circumstances indeed, he was excited to glory in these things, and to mention other visions, which had been made to him: yet he should not "act foolishly," as he could do it with perfect truth; which probably was not the case with the false teachers. He would, however, forbear speaking further on that subject, lest some of his friends should think more highly of him, than his manifest conduct and ministry authorized; and should thus be tempted to honor him too much, and perhaps to undervalue other faithful ministers in the comparison. (Marg. Ref. n—p.) Fourteen years had passed, since the apostle had this most extraordinary vision; and he had not, as it appears, before mentioned it: he must therefore be allowed to have been exceedingly reluctant to glory, in the honor conferred on him. The vision seems to have been vouchsafed to him, especially for his own support and encouragement amidst his various labors and sufferings: and, as no revelation of divine truth, needful to be known and believed by Christians, or ministers, was made to him; it was not only impossible, but even unlawful, if it could have been done, to relate what he had heard and seen.—As two distinct words are used, it is most natural to suppose, that they were intended to convey two distinct ideas.

9 And he said unto me, <sup>y</sup>My grace is sufficient for thee; <sup>z</sup>for my strength is made perfect in weakness. <sup>a</sup>Most gladly therefore will I rather <sup>b</sup>glory in my infirmities, that <sup>c</sup>the power of Christ may rest upon me.

10 Therefore <sup>d</sup>I take pleasure <sup>e</sup>in infirmities, in reproaches, in necessities, in persecutions, in distresses <sup>f</sup>for Christ's sake: <sup>g</sup>for when I am weak, then am I strong.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—The apostle was not left to forget, that he was a feeble sinful man, wholly dependent on mercy and grace, amidst all his honorable distinctions: his extraordinary and multiplied revelations were therefore soon followed by trials of a peculiarly distressing nature, lest they should prove an incentive to spiritual pride. What he saw in the third heavens must have been, in its own nature, of a humbling tendency: (Notes, Job 42:1—6. Is. 6:1—5.) yet when he came among his brethren, he would be apt to think, however otherwise abased, that none of them had seen or heard what he had seen and heard; or been favored with such visions of God, as this in the third heaven. Thus the vision might have proved an occasion of self-preference, which would have induced a long train of evil consequences. But his gracious Lord, perceiving the danger, counteracted these effects, by "giving him a thorn in the flesh, &c." (Marg. Ref. q—s.) The expressions, here employed, have occasioned commentators almost as much perplexity, as the trial itself gave the apostle: but had it seemed good to the Holy Spirit, that our curiosity should be fully gratified in this respect, he would have led the writer to be more explicit; and the general statement is more suited for edification, than if the particular trial had been specified. (Notes, Gen. 32:25—31. P. O. 13—32.)—"A thorn," fixed and rankling in the flesh, would give great and constant pain; and some particular trials of the apostle, which began or were augmented, after this remarkable vision, caused a continual uneasiness to his mind of a similar nature. Probably, these arose from the personal defects, of which he was conscious, which gave his enemies, especially the false apostles, a color for reviling and deriding him. (Note, 11:13—15.) These things seemed to him likely to obstruct his usefulness, and they continually reminded him of his weakness and inability to do "any thing as of himself." Thus they were exceedingly uneasy and mortifying to him; and doubtless they afforded Satan "and his angels" an opportunity of tempting him to impatience, and discouraging him in his labors; as well as of exciting carnal men to insult and injure him.—Being thus constantly harassed and "buffeted," he thrice besought the Lord Jesus, that this "thorn in the flesh" might be removed from him; (as Jesus had thrice besought his Father, that "the cup might pass from him." (Notes, Matt. 26:36—46.) and that "the messenger of Satan" might be compelled to depart: probably supposing, that otherwise he should not be able to proceed in his ministry with any encouraging prospect of success. This seems to prove, that he did not mean his persecutions, but those infirmities which emboldened his enemies and the false teachers. (Marg. Ref. x.—Notes, 10:7—11. Gal. 4:12—16.) The Lord, however, did not see good to grant his request: as he knew that this sharp trial was needful to keep him humble, and even to illustrate the power of his own grace. He was therefore pleased to continue his servant under it: but at the same time, he assured him, by immediate revelation, that his grace should certainly be communicated to him, in that measure, which would be sufficient to support and comfort him under the affliction, and to enable him to fulfil his ministry notwithstanding: because his divine power had its most perfect work, and appeared most illustrious, by means of "the weakness" of those, who were thus enabled to bear and perform such things, as in themselves they were, consciously and evidently, unfit for. (Marg. Ref. y, z.—Notes, 4:7. 1 Cor. 1:10—25. 2:1—5.) Thus the apostle's mind had been composed: nay, with heart-felt joy he "gloried in his infirmities;" in order that it might the more undeniably appear, that "the power of Christ" overshadowed, surrounded, and "rested upon him;" seeing he was evidently made very successful, in his extensive and important work; though he seemed to be disqualified for it, and also placed in such circumstances, as to render it impossible he should proceed. Christ's omnipotence was glorified through Paul's weakness; and this made him "well pleased" with his infirmities, the reproaches, necessities, persecutions, and distresses, to which he was exposed for his sake. He even counted them sources of pleasure and enjoyment; (Note, Rom. 5:3—5.) especially as he found that, in proportion as he was weak, in his own estimation, and that of other men; he was led more entirely to depend on Christ for strength, and so was actually made strong to bear all the sufferings, to resist all the temptations, and to perform all the services, to which he was called.—This passage contains a most express example of prayer to Christ, and of confiding and glorying in him, as the Source of grace and power. (Marg. Ref. a—g.—Notes, Ps. 146:3. Jer. 17:5—8.)—Had “the thorn in the flesh,” consisted of disorders brought on the apostle, by the effect of the visions on his animal frame, he must have “known that he was in the body.” (Note, 1—6.)—He could hardly have rejoiced in the continuance of those gross temptations, of which many of the fathers groundlessly suppose him to speak. (Note, 1 Cor. 7:6—9, v. 7.)—The “messenger also of Satan,” is so involved with “the thorn in the flesh,” in the narration, in the prayer, and in our Lord’s answer; that it must mean, either the source whence his infirmities arose, (Note, Job 2:6—8.) or the inward temptations which accompanied them.

11 I am <sup>h</sup> become a fool in glorying: ye have compelled me: for I ought to have been commended of you; <sup>i</sup> for in nothing am I behind the very chiefest apostles, <sup>k</sup> though I be nothing.

12 Truly <sup>l</sup> the signs of an apostle were wrought among you in all patience, in signs, and wonders, and mighty deeds.

13 For what is it wherein ye were inferior to other churches, except it be that <sup>m</sup> I myself was not burdensome to you? <sup>n</sup> forgive me this wrong.

Note.—Every topic unavoidably led the apostle to speak of the Lord’s special favor towards him, even in his most humiliating trials. But if the Corinthians thought that he was “become a fool in glorying,” it followed, that they “had compelled him:” for they ought strenuously to have stood up in defence of his character and ministry, when attacked by false teachers, as he was in no respect inferior to the greatest apostles; (11:5.) though he was “nothing” in himself, or compared with his Lord: his credit was of no consequence, apart from the glory of Christ; he was greatly disesteemed; and he was willing to be still more abased, that Christ might be the more glorified.

Yet, in fact, all the signs and miracles, which distinguished the other apostles, had been wrought among the Corinthians, connected with great patience and perseverance, amidst difficulties and persecutions; especially in conferring on them also miraculous powers: nor was there any thing, in which they were less favored, than other churches; except that he had never burthened them by requiring a maintenance. If any of them would censure him, and complain of this, as “a wrong” done them; he must crave forgiveness of this his single offence, though he had fallen into it from a regard to their good.

14 Behold, <sup>o</sup> the third time I am ready to come to you; and I will not be burdensome to you; <sup>p</sup> for I seek not yours, but you: <sup>q</sup> for the children ought not to lay up for the parents, but the parents for the children.

15 And I <sup>r</sup> will very gladly spend and be spent for <sup>s</sup> you; <sup>t</sup> though the more abundantly I love you, the less I be loved.

Note.—The apostle had once been at Corinth; and he had repeatedly purposed to come again, and declared that purpose, but he had been disappointed. (Marg. Ref. o.—Notes, 1:15,16. 13:1—4. 1 Cor. 16:5—9.) However, the third time he fully expected, that he should visit them: and he had resolved to put them to no expense on his account when he came; as he sought not to share their property, but to win and save their souls. For children were not expected to lay up money, as a future supply for their parents, but the parents for their children: and thus he had determined to do whatever he could to enrich the Corinthians with spiritual blessings, as their father in Christ, without accepting of any other return, than their grateful affection. (Marg. Ref. p, q.—Note, 1 Cor. 4:14—17.) Nay, he was even willing “to spend” his time, talents, health, and strength, among them: yea, “to be spent,” and worn out, in his labors for the good of their souls; (Notes, 1 The. 2:9—12. 2 Tim. 2:8—13.) even though, the more abundantly and fervently he loved them, the less they loved him, and the more neglect and contempt they expressed towards him. (Marg. Ref. r, s.)—A more excellent frame of mind can scarcely be conceived, than that which is described in these emphatical words. (Note, Rom. 12:17—21.)

Note.—Many preachers and writers, without hesitation, quote this verse, as the words of the apostle, giving an account of his own management: and it is to be feared, that it is often used to excuse or commend duplicity, in a variety of ways, by which men allow themselves to impose on others by false appearances and pretences; in order to promote, what they think the cause of truth and of God. (Note, Rom. 8:5—8.) But nothing can be more foreign to the true meaning of the passage, as it stands in the context: for it is undeniably the objection, which the apostle supposed his opposers at Corinth would make, to the account which he had given of his own disinterested conduct. In this indeed commentators of every kind are almost unanimous.—The false teachers would be ready to answer, that, though the apostle did not openly “burden” the people; yet, being an artful man, he craftily drew them in, by various pretences; and so obtained larger sums of them in an under-hand manner, than would have sufficed for his maintenance. 17 Did <sup>x</sup> I make a gain of you by any of them whom I sent unto you?

20 For I fear, lest when I come, <sup>f</sup> I shall not find you such as I would, <sup>g</sup> and that I shall be found unto you such as ye would not: lest there be <sup>h</sup> debates, envyings, wraths, strifes, backbitings, <sup>i</sup> whisperings, <sup>k</sup> swellings, tumults:

21 And lest, when I come again, <sup>l</sup> my God will humble me among you, and <sup>m</sup> that I shall bewail many which have <sup>n</sup> sinned already, <sup>o</sup> and have not repented of the <sup>p</sup> uncleanness, and fornication, and lasciviousness which they have committed.

Note.—To this objection the apostle replied, by inquiring, whether they could mention any man whom he had sent among them, by whom he had made a gain of them? (Note, 8:16—24.) Had not Titus, and others, acted in the same disinterested manner that he had done? And would some still pretend, that they only “made an apology” for themselves from sinister views? To this he would answer that he spoke before God, as revealing himself in Christ;

(Note, 1:23,24.) and that he did all things in subserviency to their edification, who were dearly beloved by him, notwithstanding all their unkindness. (Marg. Ref. x—a.) For he greatly feared, lest when he visited them, after the delays which he had purposely made, he should still find the church far from that pure state which he desired; and that they would not find him so gentle among them, as they would have him to be: (Note, 13:1—4.) but that he should meet with violent contentions, bitter envyings, mutual wrath and strife, and reciprocal slanders, suspicions, and surmises; while some would swell with pride, ambition, and disdain, or attempt to excite tumults against him, or those in the church who were not of their party. (Marg. Ref. b—k.—Notes, Rom. 1:28—32. Gal. 5:19—21. 2 Tim. 3:1—5.) So that he feared lest his visit to Corinth, like “the thorn in his flesh,” would be a trial to him, and a cause of humiliation and dejection, rather than of comfort: and that he should be constrained to bewail the case of many, who had grievously sinned, and had not repented of their enormities. These last verses show, to what dreadful excesses the self-sufficient teachers had drawn aside their deluded followers: and that the incestuous person, who had been brought to repentance, was only one of a considerable number, who had committed crimes of a similar nature; and who persisted so obstinately in them, that there was a danger lest they should unite against the apostle’s authority; and so constrain him to use great severity. (Marg. Ref. l—p.)—This surely gives us the idea of Gentiles, who professed Christianity, and corrupted it with heathen speculations and licentiousness; rather than of those, who attempted to impose the law of Moses on the Gentile converts.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10.

When we cannot avoid speaking such things concerning ourselves, as seem to imply boasting; we should use every method of rendering our conduct in so doing consistent with modesty and humility.—Those things, which are seen, and heard, “in the heaven of heavens,” are so far above our present conceptions, that the most eminent believers could not sustain the view of them; except they were cast into such an ecstasy, as not to know whether they were "in the body, or out of the body;" nor can human language make the result of such visions intelligible to mortal ears. While this should teach us to enlarge our expectations of the "glory that shall be revealed;" it should also render us contented with our more ordinary method of learning the truth and will of God.—For the heart, even of the best of men, has in it the remains of pride; and even "visions and revelations of the Lord" might occasion self-exaltation. (Notes, and P. O. 2 Chr. 32: 24—33.) When any thing of this kind takes place in those whom he loves, some "thorn in the flesh" will be surely "given them," and a "messenger of Satan" let loose to "buffet them;" on the contrary, the delusions of enthusiasts tend only to pride, without any counterpoise. It is however very surprising, that the relics of corrupt nature should as it were learn pride in heaven, and that grace should be taught humility, even by Satan and his messengers.—However painful the process may be, the wise Christian will be thankful to be kept from being "exalted above measure;" and he will be more ready to speak of his sins and follies, than of his extraordinary discoveries and consolations; for he will not desire, that "any one should think of him above what he seeth him to be."—Whatever there is in any man's experience, whether of outward trials, or of inward conflicts and temptations, which serves to counterbalance more encouraging circumstances and events, and mortify pride: he may very properly consider it as a "thorn in the flesh," given to him to prevent far worse consequences. And it is especially matter of gratitude, when this prevention is effected; without his being left to commit actual sin, or to dishonor the gospel.—When we are "buffeted" by Satan or his agents, we should apply without delay, and with all earnestness, to our "merciful and faithful High Priest;" who "suffered being tempted, that he might be able to succor those that are tempted;" (Notes, Heb. 2:16—18. 4:14—16.) and we should be frequent, as well as instant, in beseeching him, that those temptations and trials may depart, which appear to impede our usefulness, or to endanger the credit of our profession. Yet we must not conclude that our prayers are rejected, when the desired deliverance is delayed; as he may see those conflicts salutary, which we deem ruinous. His wisdom must be trusted, as well as his truth and love: and when we strive against sin, bear up under discouragements, and attend to our duty, in dependence on him; we may rest satisfied "that his grace will be sufficient for us, and that his strength will be made perfect in our weakness." (Notes, Ps. 138:3. Is. 40:27—31. Eph. 3:14—19. Phil. 4:10—13, v. 13. Col. 1:9—14, v. 11, 12.) He frequently answers prayer by reconciling our minds to humiliating trials, and by increasing our strength for that conflict which we were desirous of declining: and sometimes Christians have such views of his glory, and such confidence in his grace, that they can "most gladly glory in their infirmities," assured that "his power will rest upon them," and be honored in and by them. Thus a man may even "take pleasure in infirmities, in reproaches, necessities, persecutions, and distresses, for Christ's sake;" and though we have not by far arrived at this vigor of faith and love; yet if we are indeed believers, we have also found, that when we most felt our own weakness, we were peculiarly "strong in the Lord;" and when we began to think ourselves strong, we have been left to discover, and perhaps to expose, our own weakness. Nor let it be forgotten, that whatever religious instruction or principle leads men to think, that they have any strength, in themselves, proportionably renders them weak, in the hour of temptation: while the humbling consciousness, that there is no health, or help, or strength in us, as connected with a constant reliance on the all-sufficient grace of Christ, and fervent prayer for his effectual assistance, conduces proportionably to make us "strong in the grace of our Lord," for service, suffering, conflict, and triumphant victory.

They, who do not give proper commendation to such as have faithfully labored for their good, but prefer every new voice to that of their own pastors, often compel them to glory, and then perhaps censure them for it. But, whatever the Lord may give us, or do by us, "we are nothing" in ourselves, but sin and folly: so that the deepest self-abasement and self-renunciation, not only consist with the consciousness of the Lord's special goodness towards us, but are intimately connected with it.—It is a great thing for ministers to be warranted in saying before God and to the people, "we seek not yours but you;" not your property, but your souls. Alas! in what numerous or rather numberless instances must the words be transposed, in order to be true; as the preachers seek only the property and not the salvation, of their hearers! But the more disinterested our labors are, the more apostolical they must be allowed to be: and it is generally desirable to avoid being burdensome to our congregations; for far more will "forgive us this wrong," than the very appearance of being mercenary. Indeed we should, as far as we can, imitate the conduct of affectionate parents, who seek to enrich their children, and not to be enriched by them.—But how very difficult is it, "most gladly to spend and be spent" for those, who make unkind returns; and who seem to love those least who most love them! We are alas, soon vanquished in contests of this kind; and may hence infer, how far short we are of the apostle's measure of grace, who yet, long after this, confessed that "he had not already attained;" (Note, Phil. 3:12—14.) and thus we may be excited to pray for an increase of faith, love, and patience.—No excellency of spirit or conduct can silence calumny: and if we were even as holy as Paul, some would revile us as "crafty men, who took others by guile." It is well when we can disprove such slanders, and when fellow-laborers "walk in the same spirit and steps." We should not, however, be too anxious to defend ourselves, and plead our own cause, being satisfied with a clear conscience towards God: yet we ought to "do all things for the edification" of our brethren, and the recovery of such as have been drawn aside.—But how can faithful ministers be expected to prove such as their people desire; when they witness among them those contentions, envies, slanders, whisperings, boastings, and tumults, which not only grieve and humble them, but also disgrace the gospel? (Note, 1 Kings 22:8. P. O. 1—9.) Alas! they are often cast down, and sent to “bemoan” the crimes of those, whom they fondly hoped would be a comfort to them; and they are frequently distressed on account of their own mistakes or infirmities, which they fear have tended to prevent their usefulness. But how grievous is it, that such evils should prevail among the professors of the gospel; and that we should still have to lament over many, who have grievously “sinned, and have not repented of the uncleanness, and fornication, and lasciviousness, which they have committed!” Yet we need not despond on this account; for it was so even in the apostle’s days. But while we observe that “the enemy hath done this;” we should not forget to add, that it was by means of antinomian and self-conceited teachers; and perhaps through our own unwatchfulness, or carnal and undecided conduct.

CHAP. XIII.

The apostle declares his expectation and purpose of inflicting miraculous punishments on those who persisted in opposing his authority, 1—1. He exhorts the people to self-examination, 5, and to disarm him of his power to use sharpness, by their previous repentance, 6—10. He concludes with exhortations, salutations, and benedictions, 11—14.

THIS is <sup>a</sup> the third time I am coming to you. <sup>b</sup> In the mouth of two or three witnesses shall every word be established.

<sup>2</sup> I <sup>c</sup> told you before, and foretell you, as if I were present, the second time; and, <sup>d</sup> being absent, now I write to them which <sup>e</sup> heretofore have sinned, and to all other, that, if I come again, I will not spare:

<sup>4</sup> For though <sup>i</sup> he was crucified through weakness, <sup>k</sup> yet he liveth by the power of God. For <sup>l</sup> we also are weak <sup>m</sup> in him, <sup>n</sup> but we shall live with him, by the power of God toward you.

Note.—(Note, 12:14,15.) As the law of God by Moses had prescribed, that no accused person should be condemned, unless two or three witnesses testified against him; so the repeated warnings given by the apostle, of his purpose to come and inflict punishment on the impenitent offenders at Corinth, would, as it were, testify against them, and make way for those judgments. (Marg. Ref. b, c.—Notes, Num. 35:24—30. Deut. 17:2—7. 19:15—21.) Or rather, when at length he should come, he would proceed against them according to that law, or to the rule laid down by Christ for his disciples. (Notes, Matt. 18:15—18.)—In the former epistle he had before told them of his purpose: in the preceding part of this epistle he had again warned them, as if present with them; and here again at the conclusion, being yet “absent,” and giving them a little longer space to repent, he now wrote, to assure those who had before sinned and continued untractable, and all others who might countenance them, that “when he came again, he would not spare” the offenders, nor appear so timid and weak as they before had concluded him to be: (Notes, 10:1—11. 12:17—21. 1 Cor. 4:18—21. 5:1—5.) especially as some of them boldly demanded “proof” of Christ’s speaking “in him” as his apostle; though this had already been confirmed by no feeble evidence, but by his mighty power working in and among them, in various ways. “Christ showed his power among them, by enabling St. Paul to preach the gospel to them, “in demonstration of the Spirit and of power,” so efficaciously, as to “convert them to the faith; (1 Cor. 2:4.) in that variety of gifts conferred on them, together with the gospel, by which “the testimony of Christ was confirmed;” (1 Cor. 1:6.) by his power, conspicuous in seconding St. Paul’s delivery of the incestuous Corinthian up to Satan: (1 Cor. 5:4,5.)... and by the chastisements they suffered for communicating in the Lord’s supper unworthily.” Whitby. (Notes, 2:5—11. 1 Cor. 11:29—34.)—For though Jesus was crucified, as if he had been only a weak, helpless man; and was despised as unable “to save himself;” yet he was raised from the dead and lived in glory, “by the power of God;” to “put all enemies under his feet.” In like manner, the apostle and his brethren appeared weak and despicable, as being made like the Saviour; and the power, which they spake of, seemed to be dead, because they did not exercise it: yet they were assured that it would revive, and that they should be evidently quickened, and endued with the power of God, exerted in their behalf towards the disobedient Corinthians, by inflicting miraculous judgments upon them. (Note, 4:8—12.)—The language here used to the refractory Corinthians contains the strongest proof imaginable, that the apostle was conscious, that he spake and acted by a divine authority; and that he feared no detection, and was certain that his Lord would put all his opposers to confusion.—*In the mouth, &c. <sup>a</sup> Jesus Christ is in you, except ye be <sup>c</sup>reprobates?

6 But <sup>s</sup> I trust that ye shall know that we are not reprobates. [Practical Observations.]

Note.—Instead of presumptuously judging the apostle, and demanding his credentials; it behoved the persons concerned, and indeed all the Christians at Corinth, to “examine themselves, whether they” really “were in the faith;” and whether they had any thing more than a formal profession and a dead faith. Let them then prove their tempers, conduct, and experience, by the standard of God’s word, as gold is assayed or tried by the touchstone; for he feared that many of them were self-deceived in this important concern. After all their boasting of knowledge, would they continue ignorant of themselves, of their own state, character, and hearts? or that “Jesus Christ was in them,” by the in-dwelling of his Spirit, by his image renewed on their souls, by his kingdom set up in their hearts, and by possessing their supreme love and affection; unless they were to that day merely nominal Christians, who would at last be disapproved and rejected, as the dross is by the refiner? (Marg. Ref. n—r.)—Some expositors render the clause, “Christ is among you, except, &c.” but this conveys no definite idea. The apostle could not mean to intimate, that Christ was not at all present in the church at Corinth; for this would have contradicted all the declarations, which he made concerning them: and the presence of Christ, among them, could not prove that those individuals, whom he warned were true believers, and approved by God: yet this was the precise point, which he exhorted them personally to examine.—In determining this question, they would also decide another, as far as they were individually concerned: seeing that those, who could clearly ascertain, that “Christ dwelt in their hearts by faith,” must consider themselves as living demonstrations, that Paul was a true apostle; for “the seal of his apostleship were they in the Lord:” (Notes, 3:1—3. 1 Cor. 9:1—3.) and they could not disprove his claim, without acknowledging themselves to be without proof of their own conversion. He trusted, therefore, that in this way many knew that Christ had approved and owned his ministry; and all the rest would soon know it in another manner.—Reprobates. (6) ‘Thus the apostle calls in this place, not those who are not divinely elected to eternal life; (for they who still continue in their sins, not being yet effectually called, are not directly to be considered as “vessels of wrath;” nor those who, after their calling, fall into grievous ‘sins;’) but such as are not at present approved.’ Beza.—It does not appear that either the original word, or our English word “reprobates,” is ever in scripture used as the opposite to “elect,” or indeed with direct reference to election; and as to reprobation, it is, I apprehend, a scriptural idea, (for those who are not “chosen,” must be rejected, or passed by,) but not a scriptural word in any sense. (Notes, 10:17,18. Jer. 6:27—30. 1 Cor. 9:24—27.)

Examine. (5) Ἐπειμαζετε. Matt. 4:1,3. 16:1. 19:3. 22:18, et al. From πειμα, Heb. 11:29, 36.—Prove.] Ἀδοξίμου. 8:8,22. See on Luke 12:56.—Reprobates.] Ἀδοξίμου. 6,7. See on Rom. 1:28.

7 Now <sup>i</sup> I pray to God that ye do no evil; not that we should appear <sup>u</sup> approved, but that ye should do that which is <sup>x</sup> honest, though we be <sup>y</sup> as reprobates.

8 For <sup>z</sup> we can do nothing against the truth, but for the truth.

9 For we are glad, <sup>a</sup> when we are weak, and ye are strong: and this also we wish, <sup>b</sup> even your perfection.

10 Therefore <sup>c</sup> I write these things, being absent, <sup>d</sup> lest being present I should use sharpness, according to the power which the Lord hath given me to edification, and not to destruction.

Note.—The apostle prayed for his brethren at Corinth, that they might “do no evil,” but repent of what they had done: not that he and his friends should appear “approved,” by the submission of all parties to his authority; but that they might do what was right and becoming them, though it should occasion him to be disapproved and censured; or even thought destitute of apostolical authority, because he had no occasion given him of exercising it by inflicting judgments. (Marg. Ref. t—x.) For indeed he and his brethren “could do nothing” in this way “against the truth” of the gospel, being vested with miraculous powers only that they might defend the truth: and should they attempt to work a miracle, in their own spirit, to advance their own credit, or to punish their opponents, contrary to the will of God, and the interests of true religion; God would not exert his power to sanction their wrong spirit and conduct; and so their attempt would be in vain. (Marg. Ref. y, z.—Notes, 1 Kings 17:1. 2 Kings 1:10. 2:23,24. Prov. 26:2. Luke 9:51—56.) But indeed the apostle loved their souls far more than his own reputation: and therefore he should be “glad to be weak,” in this respect, by their strength of faith and grace removing all occasion of displaying his power: and indeed the great desire of his heart was their perfect re-establishment in the faith and holiness of the gospel; as a man is perfectly recovered from a dangerous malady, or from the breaking or dislocation of his bones. (Marg. Ref. a, b.) Therefore he wrote these things before he came to Corinth, that they might have time for this complete recovery: lest, contrary to his inclination, he should be compelled to use severity, according to his apostolical power which the Lord had entrusted to him; that, in the use of it he might promote the edification

Note.—The apostle at length closed this most instructive epistle, with his friendly salutations, and affectionate desires and prayers for the present and future welfare of the Christians at Corinth: exhorting them to be sincere, entire, established in the faith, and unreservedly the disciples of Christ; exciting them to be “joyful in the Lord,” and “of good comfort” amidst all temptations; and also to exhort and animate one another: calling on them to lay aside contentions, that they might all be of “one heart and judgment;” delighting in and attending to the same things, and “living in peace;” (Marg. Ref. e—i.—Notes, Rom. 12:14—16. 1 Cor. 1:10—16. Eph. 4:1—6. Phil. 1:27—30. 2:1—4.) and assuring them, that in this way, “the God of love and peace,” the Source and Pattern of love and peace, would manifest his presence among them and bless them. (Marg. Ref. k, l.—Note, Phil. 4:8,9.) As a token of their mutual forgiveness and love, let them salute each other with a holy kiss. (Marg. Ref. m.) He assured them, that “all the saints,” residing where he then was, desired affectionately to salute them. And finally he prayed that the free favor, mercy, and salvation of the Lord Jesus Christ; all which comes to believers, through his mediation, his righteousness, atonement, and intercession; with the love of God the Father to them, as the objects of his choice, and his adopted children, and as rendering them joyful in loving God with all their heart; and the participation of all the gifts, graces, and consolations of the Holy Ghost, might be with them all. That so, all blessings from the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost, in whose One name they had been baptized, might be conferred on all of them, and constantly enjoyed by all of them, without exception; to the glory of the three Persons in the sacred Trinity, according to the parts and offices which they sustain, in the great work of man’s redemption. (Notes, Num. 6:24—27. Matt. 23:19,20.)—This most comprehensive benediction has generally been adopted in the worship of Christians, when about to separate; but alas, it is too evident, that most in our congregations, not to say of the officiating ministers, regard it as a mere form.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

All rigorous measures should be preceded by long patience and many warnings, when the case will admit of them; and with caution and deliberation, upon sure grounds, and with firmness of mind.—Those who will not be convinced by the abundant evidences already afforded, that Christ speaks by his faithful ministers, will at length experience a very awful demonstration of it. These cannot appear more weak and despicable in the eyes of carnal men, than Jesus did to the chief priests, rulers, and people, when he hung upon the cross: (Note, Matt. 27:39—44.) yet he now lives, and has “all power in heaven and earth:” and when he shall come to judgment, every denunciation of vengeance uttered by his servants, according to his word, will be found to be “living” and powerful for the condemnation of despisers. We should therefore, diligently and impartially, “examine ourselves, whether we are in the faith;” (Note, 1 Cor. 11:23—28.) and instead of imagining that it is always unbelief to doubt of our acceptance; we should daily bring the whole of our faith, experience, motives, comforts, affections, words, and works, to be assayed by the touchstone of the scriptures; that we may get well acquainted with ourselves; obtain an assurance that will not shrink from investigation; and possess that “hope, which maketh not ashamed, because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost.” (Note, Rom. 5:3—5.) For except “Jesus Christ be in us,” by his Spirit, his image, and the governing power of his love, our faith is dead, and we are as yet disapproved by our Judge. While ministers give these warnings, they should also look well to themselves. For nothing can be imagined equally dreadful, with the case of those, who have instructed, warned, reproved, and expostulated, with others on these infinitely important subjects; and have been eventually successful in their endeavors: if they themselves should be found reprobates, and be finally rejected as hypocrites. Then all their own public instructions and private exhortations addressed to others, and their social prayers, nay the letters and books which they have written, shall rise up in judgment against themselves; and it shall be said to them, "Out of thy own mouth will I judge thee, thou wicked servant." May God preserve all of us from this awful doom!—In general, however, those who are most presumptuous in judging others, have most reason to look diligently, and even with suspicion, to themselves.

V. 7—14.

We should earnestly pray to God in behalf of those, whom we caution or reprove, that they may "cease to do evil, and learn to do well;" though their good conduct, "as it becometh the gospel of Christ," should expose us to censure for our doubts concerning them. For it is our duty to rejoice, when others are "strong in the grace of Christ," though that should be the means of exposing our own weakness; and to long for the perfection of knowledge, holiness, and comfort, in behalf of those who had imbibed a strong dislike to us; even if this should proportionally confirm and increase men's prejudices against ourselves. In short, all our interests and feelings, except our present holiness, and our future felicity, should be considered as comparatively a small matter, when they come in competition with the honor of Christ, and the prosperity of his church.—The miraculous powers of the apostles could not be used "against the truth," but only in its defence: yet abilities, gifts, authority, and influence, as well as the censures and excommunications of the church, with every power to persecute those branded as heretics, may be employed against the cause of Christ, and the edification of his people; yea, to the destruction of the possessors and of numbers along with them: we should then pray for grace to preserve us from doing mischief, and to enable us and all concerned, to make a proper improvement of our several talents.—If we would have "the God of love and peace to be with us," for our spiritual advantage and consolation; we should use diligently every means of becoming "steadfast in the faith of Christ," and endeavor to act consistently with it; to be united in heart and soul with all our brethren, and to follow peace with all men. Then we may hope that "the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, the love of God the Father, and the communion of the Holy Spirit, will be with us all:" that, through us, glory may be 'to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost; as it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be, world without end, Amen.' And what more can we desire for ourselves, or our brethren, than this frequently repeated apostolical benediction implies? May we then at all times, when these words are on our lips, or spoken in our hearing, so enter into the meaning of them, with fervent affections, and enlarged desires and expectations; that the blessings prayed for by them may be upon us and all our fellow-worshippers, now and for evermore! Amen.

The Galatians, or Gallogrecians, were the descendants of Gauls, who migrated from their own country, to seek for new settlements; and who, after a variety of disasters, got possession of a considerable district in Asia Minor, near to Lycaonia, Lystra, and Iconium. (Notes, Acts 16:6—12. 18:18—23.) It is supposed, that they retained their native language and customs, at the time when the gospel was first preached among them. Learned men have shown it to be probable, that this was, during the first progress of Paul and Barnabas through those regions: (Acts 14:) for though Galatia is not mentioned, yet "the regions round about Lycaonia," may be supposed to include Galatia. But some attempts to fix the date of their conversion to an earlier period, are wholly destitute of scriptural proof, and unsupported by any solid argument.—It is plain, that the Galatians were generally idolatrous Gentiles, before their conversion. The apostle was not able to spend much time among them, because of his multiplied engagements; yet he asserts, in a way which challenges refutation, that he conferred miraculous gifts on them. (Note, 3:1—5.) But soon after he left them, some professed converts to Christianity, who were zealous for the Mosaic law, intruded among them; drawing them off from the true gospel, to depend on ceremonial observances, and to the vain endeavor of "establishing their own righteousness." The way in which the apostle, with the greatest decision and apparent severity, opposes this false gospel, will appear as we proceed; but certainly it shows, that he considered the very life and soul of Christianity to be at stake. Yet his opposition to this self-righteous perversion of Christianity does not, in the smallest degree, lead him to overlook its holy and practical tendency: and, in this respect, the epistle before us forms a striking contrast to the over zealous and vehement earnestness of numbers, for a part of Christianity; while another part of equal importance is overlooked, if not disparaged.—Learned men maintain different opinions, as to the time when this epistle was written. Most, however, agree, that the apocryphal postscript which dates it from Rome, contains a direct untruth. It is probable, that it was written during the apostle's residence at Corinth; though some fix the date of it to the time, during which the apostle abode at Antioch, after his first progress through Asia Minor with Barnabas, and after the council at Jerusalem; but before he set off the second time, with Silas and Timothy, when the decrees were delivered to the churches. (Notes, Acts 15:30—41. 16:1—5.) The former opinion is, however, more generally maintained: indeed it is not certain, that the apostle had been in Galatia, before his second progress through Asia Minor: (Note, Acts 16:6—12.) and the objection to the epistle's being written at a later period, arising from the decrees which had been sent by the apostles to the churches, which might, it is thought, have superseded the necessity of it, seems of little weight. The apostles had indeed decided against the ceremonial law being imposed on the Gentile converts; but they had not shown, that the Gentiles, by voluntarily submitting to it, went about to "establish their own righteousness," and virtually renounced the gospel.—Ancyra, Pressinus, Tavium, and Germa, are mentioned by geographers, as cities of Galatia; nay, Iconium is by some numbered among them: and St. Paul is supposed to have founded churches in these and other cities in that district.

CHAP. I.

Paul asserts his divine appointment to the apostolical office, 1. He salutes the churches of Galatia, and praises God, 2—5. He sharply reproves the Galatians for so soon turning aside to a false gospel and denounces an awful curse on all who preached any other doctrine, than that which they had received from him, 6—10. He declares that he had his authority and instructions from Christ: and shows what his conduct had been before his conversion, and what it was afterwards, 11—21.

2 And <sup>g</sup> all the brethren which are with me, unto <sup>h</sup> the churches of Galatia:

Note.—(Note, Acts 13:1—3.) It is highly probable, that the Judaizing teachers in Galatia expressly denied Paul to be an apostle; or at least maintained that he was not equal to Peter and the other apostles. (Note, 2:1—16.) He therefore began his epistle by calling himself an apostle, and declaring that he was not sent forth by human authority, nor yet by the intervention of any man, as even Matthias had been; (Note, Acts 1:15—26.) "but by Jesus Christ, and by God the Father who raised him from the dead. As Christ received his mediatorial kingdom from the Father; so Paul received his apostleship from Christ, and from "God the Father" by him: and, though he was not appointed to that office, before the death of Jesus, as most of the other apostles were; yet his authority was equally valid, being personally conferred on him by his "risen" Lord and Saviour. (Marg. Ref. d—f.—Notes, Acts 9:15,16. 22:14—21. 26:16—18.) Ananias baptized Paul; but he neither appointed him to the apostleship, nor instructed him for it.—With him, all the brethren (probably the ministers were intended,) who were then with the apostle, joined in this epistle; as testifying the facts, and concurring in the doctrines, contained in it.—Perhaps the apostle meant to "distinguish himself from those, who were constituted by the apostles ... and sent by them "to different places; being peculiarly named

'evangelists. Of this kind were Timothy, 'Titus, Luke, and other companions of Paul, 'who were celebrated in his epistles, and the 'Acts of the Apostles.' Beza.—The epistle was addressed to "the churches of Galatia," or the several congregations of professed Christians, which had been collected in that province: but he did not call them "saints;" perhaps because, as they had departed from the faith in the fundamental article of justification, "he stood in doubt of them." (Marg. Ref. h.—Note, 4:17—20.)

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—(Notes, Rom. 1:5—7. 1 Cor. 1:3.) After the usual salutation, the apostle added, that Jesus "gave himself" a willing and sufficient sacrifice for the sins of men, "that he might deliver" all who believed in him, from the condemnation, pollution, maxims, fashions, and conduct of "this present evil world," according "to the will" and appointment "of God our Father;" to whom the whole glory ought to be, and would be, referred for ever, and to whom he thus ascribed it. (Marg. Ref. i—p.) This deliverance could not be effected, consistently with the glory of God; except by the redemption of Christ, and the acceptance, reconciliation, and grace, which are through him: if then the Galatians renounced their dependence on Christ, they must continue enslaved to "this present evil world," and be condemned with it; for no outward forms, or observances, could deliver them from it, or give them the victory over it. (Notes, 1 John 5:4, 5,19—21.)—Some indeed interpret the words which we render "this present evil world," of the Mosaic dispensation; which was then become a mere carnal system, connected with the love and spirit of the world, the fear of men, bondage to sin, and exposedness to condemnation. (Note, 4:21—31.) But the preceding explanation is far more extensive and natural: most of the Galatians were Gentiles before their conversion; and even the ritual law of Moses is never called “evil” in scripture, much less the whole Mosaic dispensation: so that the interpretation is wholly inadmissible.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—It is remarkable, in how different a manner the apostle addressed the Galatians, than he did the Corinthians. It has been shown, that he used the utmost caution, and the most delicate and consummate management, in undermining the influence, and counteracting the delusions, of the false teachers at Corinth: (Preface, 1 Cor.) but he at once and abruptly attacked the error of the Galatians in a direct and open manner, without any circumlocution. The Corinthians had indeed “built wood, hay, stubble” upon “the good Foundation;” but the Galatians were attempting to lay a wrong foundation. The former “might be saved as by fire,” notwithstanding errors and abuses; but the latter must perish, unless recovered from their infatuation. (Note, 1 Cor. 3:10—15.) In the former case, the errors had been introduced more plausibly, and had diffused their baleful influence more gradually: the tares were so mingled with the wheat, that they could not be plucked up by a rough hand, without the greatest danger; and much caution was requisite, lest Satan should get still further advantages. (Notes, Matt. 13:36—43. 2 Cor. 2:5—11.) But in Galatia, the error was simple and fundamental; it was a virtual renunciation of the gospel, and destructive in its very nature. The persons, who propagated “another gospel” in Galatia, were as determined enemies to true Christianity, as “the false apostles” at Corinth, and more evidently so; but they were not equal to them in ingenuity. (Note, 2 Cor. 11:13—15.) The detection of their error also, lay within a small compass, their example was of a most dangerous tendency, their progress was likely to be very rapid unless effectually checked; and therefore the apostle opened his subject, in the language of astonishment at the conduct of the Galatians. He had been employed to “call them,” by his ministry “into the grace of Christ;” or a professed dependence for acceptance, on the free mercy of God, through the righteousness and atoning sacrifice of Christ, and by faith in him. He had fully instructed them in these important subjects, and confirmed his instructions by miracles, and the gifts of the Spirit conferred on them; and they had appeared cordially to embrace this salvation: he could not therefore but be exceedingly surprised as well as grieved, that they should so soon be induced to disclaim his ministry, and renounce his doctrine, by turning to “another gospel.” (Marg. Ref. r—u.) It was more evident, at first sight, that the Galatians had been removed from the ministry and doctrine of Paul, than it was that they had renounced Christianity; and he stood in doubt whether they had been really “called into the grace of Christ;” it is therefore more obvious to understand him, as speaking of the instrument of their outward calling, than of the Agent in effectual vocation.—Indeed the new doctrine, introduced in Galatia, was not “another gospel,” nor any gospel at all; but a most fatal delusion, shutting up under condemnation all those who adhered to it. (Note, 5:1—6.) This the apostle hoped would not be their case; as the immediate blame was to be cast on certain persons, whose aim was to trouble, perplex, and mislead the minds of the Gentile converts; and to “pervert the gospel of Christ,” out of a blind, bigoted, and proud zeal for the Mosaic dispensation. (Marg. Ref. x—z.) They, no doubt, appeared to the unstable and unwary Galatians, to speak very plausibly, concerning obedience to the law, as joined with faith in Christ, in order to justification: but he must in the strongest and plainest terms declare, that whoever preached any gospel contrary to that which he had preached to them and they had received, or even added any thing to it on the grand question of justification, would be, and ought to be, “accursed;” as one that remained under the curse of the law, and kept others under it; and as acting in direct opposition to Christ, and the glory of God in his salvation. (Note, 3:10—14.) This would be, yea, “let it be,” the case, even if Paul himself, or one of the apostles, should depart from their former doctrine, and endeavor to establish any other foundation for a sinner's hope, than that which they had laid. Indeed, were it possible for an angel to come from heaven, and to preach a doctrine contrary to the gratuitous justification of a sinner, by faith in the righteousness of Christ alone; he must at that moment become an apostate spirit, a rebel against God, an enemy to Christ, and "accursed" in himself. So that, abilities, morality, plausibility, or even miracles, were not to be regarded in this case. Nor let this be considered as the language of intemperate zeal: for he would repeat it with the greatest solemnity, and again denounce "accursed," by his apostolical authority, every one who thus attempted to lay any false foundation; that they might learn to dread and abhor those delusions, which they had unwarily encouraged. (Marg. Ref. a.—d.) For could they suppose, that after so many years of labor and suffering in the cause of Christ, he only meant to persuade men to adopt his own private sentiments, that he might ingratiate himself with them; instead of pleading the cause of God, and approving himself to him? Indeed, if this had been his object, he should never have entered on the service of Christ, or so long continued in it: and if, in so fundamental a doctrine, he accommodated his discourse to the pride and prejudices of men's hearts; he could not act as "the servant of Christ," who cannot be pleased with those things, which suit the carnal minds and worldly wisdom of men.—The apostle "became all things to all men," that he might "please them for their edification;" and he even tolerated difference of sentiment and conduct, in various instances, respecting the Mosaic law: (Note, 1 Cor. 9:19—23.) we must therefore conclude, that this decisive language related only to that fundamental doctrine, of which he was about to treat; or to other doctrines of similar clearness and importance. It does not behove us to use the same authoritative language, or to denounce anathemas on those who differ from us: yet we may properly show men, how evidently the apostle's words conclude those under the curse, who teach sinners to rely for justification, in the least measure or degree, on any thing except the free grace of God, through the righteousness and atonement of Christ. (Marg. Ref. e—h.)—Should not be, &c. 'This is a cutting reproof to all those ministers, who either alter or conceal the doctrines of the gospel, for fear of displeasing their hearers, or to gain popularity.' *Macknight. 11 But I certify you, brethren, <sup>i</sup> that the gospel which was preached of me is not after man.

12 For I neither received it of man, neither was I taught it, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ.

Note.—The reason of the awful denunciation, which the apostle had just made, was contained in the assurance which he possessed, that "his gospel was not after man;" neither of human invention, nor suited to the dispositions and opinions of mankind. For he "had not received it" from any human teaching, but it was immediately revealed to him by Jesus Christ. (Marg. Ref. i.—Note, 1,2.) This might be illustrated by facts: for they had often heard of his character and conduct, in former years when he professed the religion of the Jews; and how his extraordinary zeal had induced him, to exceed the measure of all other opposers, in furiously persecuting the church; which "he wasted," as a wolf does the sheep; or as a victorious army plunders and destroys the city which it has taken. (Marg. Ref. k, l.—Notes, Acts 8:1,3. 9:1,2. 22:1—5. 26:9—11. 1 Tim. 1:12—14.) He had also been well instructed in the religion of the Jews, and had made greater proficiency in his studies, than most of those who were his equals in age, rank, and education; as well as far exceeded them in zeal for the traditions of the elders, along with the law of Moses. (Marg. Ref. m—o.—Notes, Matt. 15:1—20.) It could not therefore be supposed, that he should at once, and contrary to all his interests and opening prospects of advancement, both embrace Christianity and preach it first to his countrymen, and soon after to the Gentiles, without regarding his former tenets and zealous attachments; unless some adequate cause had intervened to produce the extraordinary change.—'For, says he, it is well known, in what school I was educated from my youth; namely, among the principal enemies of the gospel. ... And also, that I even excelled in the religion of a Pharisee: and thus from being a Pharisee, I suddenly became the apostle of the Gentiles: so that no time intervened, in which I could be taught by man.' Beza.—'A revelation of the facts and doctrines of Christianity immediately from Christ himself, without the assistance of any human teacher, so wonderfully agreeing in all its branches with that which Christ had taught on earth, both before and after his resurrection, was so extraordinary an event, and of so great importance to those whom St. Paul visited, and to whom he wrote, that one cannot wonder he should think proper to assert it in so solemn a manner.' Doddridge.—The marked

22 And was unknown by face unto <sup>g</sup> the churches of Judea, which were <sup>h</sup> in Christ;

23 But they had heard only, That <sup>i</sup> he which persecuted us in times past, now preacheth the faith which once he destroyed.

24 And <sup>k</sup> they glorified God in me.

Note.—God had chosen Paul even "from his mother's womb," to be an apostle, and had in his purpose "set him apart" for that service; and, according to this purpose and choice, he was pleased in due time, to call him by his grace unto the knowledge and faith of the gospel, and thus of his abundant mercy to "reconcile him unto himself by Jesus Christ." Thus, along with the outward extraordinary circumstances of his conversion, it had also pleased God to "reveal his Son," in the glory of his Person and salvation, to his mind and heart, and to display his power, love, and grace in the conversion of this prejudiced and violent enemy; that he might make his name more widely known on earth, by sending him as an apostle to preach Christ to the Gentiles: (Marg. Ref. p-s.—Notes, Acts 26:16—18. 2 Cor. 4:7.) when this gracious change had taken place, he immediately prepared for obedience, without consulting with men of any description; or conferring with the dictates of his own carnal mind or worldly wisdom, about the consequences of his conduct to his interest, credit, ease, or life itself. (Marg. Ref. s-x.) When he entered on this great work, he did not go up to Jerusalem to receive instructions, or to obtain a commission from those who had been apostles, before his extraordinary conversion and appointment to that service: but he proceeded to exercise his ministry without delay, and very soon went into Arabia, for that purpose. Afterwards he preached at Damascus, till he was driven thence by persecution. At length, "after three years," he went to Jerusalem to visit Peter, as a brother in Christ; to confer with him, and to relate the gracious dealings of God, and what he had wrought by him; but neither he nor James attempted to add any thing to the instructions or authority which he had received from the Lord: and for the entire truth of all that he had stated, he solemnly appealed to God. (Marg. Ref. y-b.—Note, 2 Cor. 1:23,24.) After a short time he left Jerusalem: and the other churches in Judea did not so much as know him personally: but the account of this wonderful conversion excited them to adore the power and grace of God toward so terrible a persecutor; and to bless his name for so great a deliverance vouchsafed to his afflicted church, and for raising up so useful a minister of his gospel. But this was a designation only to the apostolical office.' Hammond.

This however, shows, that God's eternal purpose and his prescience do not interfere with man's free agency and responsibility. St. Paul would not have ascribed his conversion in any degree to himself, but altogether to the grace of God: and so would the compilers of our articles: 'they being called according to God's purpose, by his Spirit working in them in due season; they through grace obey the calling.'—In me. (16) This may be rendered, "To me." The same preposition is just after, and translated "among," it might be, "to the heathen." The apostle, however, speaks of immediate prophetic revelation, and not of ordinary divine teaching.—'Since we are told, (Acts 9:19.) that after Saul recovered his sight and strength, he was certain days with the disciples at Damascus, during which he preached Christ in the synagogues: ... we must admit, that... he spent a few days in preaching at Damascus, and then retired into Arabia, ... to receive further revelations.' Macknight.—James the brother, &c. (19) Probably, James was the son of Cleopas, or Alpheus, and Mary the sister of our Lord's mother. (Matt. 13:55. Mark 6:3.)

I conferred not. (16) Οὐ προσάρεθην. 2: 6. Not elsewhere.—With flesh and blood. [Σαρκὶ καὶ αἵματι. See on Matt. 16:17.—To see. (18) Ἰσορροπία. Here only.—Proprie, iter suscipio visendi et inspicendi causa, obo 'urbes nobiles et loca celeberrima, ut res visu dignas et maxime memorabiles inspiciam, et rerum utilium cognitionem et notiones mihi comparem. ... #### PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5.

All authority and ability to preach the gospel must come "from Jesus Christ, and from God the Father who hath raised him from the dead." In all ordinary circumstances, indeed, men are employed as instruments, in qualifying and ordaining ministers; but, without "the grace," teaching, and unction of the Spirit of Christ, which should be sought by constant fervent prayer, all that man can do, however scriptural, must prove ineffectual.—We ought also to pray for "grace and peace from God the Father and our Lord Jesus Christ," in behalf of those, of whom we doubt whether they be true saints.—The love of Christ in "giving himself for our sins," and the hopes and motives which his redemption inspires, are effectual "to deliver" the true believer "from this present world," as well as "from the wrath to come." This was intended by the divine Redeemer; it accords to the will of God, and is requisite for the display of his glory: and the consciousness of being rescued and separated from those, who were our companions in sin; made victorious over the fear of men, and the love of the world; enabled to refuse conformity to it, and to live a spiritual and heavenly life on earth, forms the proper evidence of justification in the righteousness of Christ, and through faith in him: yet numbers, who profess evangelical doctrines, seem to have no inclination to this part of God's salvation. But, as they are not "delivered from this present evil world" by the sanctification of the Spirit; it is presumptuous in them to expect exemption from its condemnation by the blood of Jesus.

V. 6—10.

It is truly astonishing, how soon and how frequently hopeful converts are removed from the ministry of those, by whom they were "first called to the grace of Christ;" and how easily they are induced to embrace "other gospels," either more flattering to self-righteous pride, or more favorable to self-indulgence. These modifications of divine truth indeed are not "the gospel;" but the devices of Satan, to deceive the unstable, to trouble the injudicious, and to pervert Christianity. While we strenuously maintain, that every kind and degree of Antinomianism eventually and powerfully tends to dishonor Christ, and destroy true religion; we must also declare in the most decided manner, that all dependence on good works, real or supposed, for justification, is still more fatal to the individuals who persist in it, at least after the truth has been fully and repeatedly set before them. No wonder, that the preachers of morality and good works, as the foundation for the sinner's hope of acceptance, or in any degree conducive to his justification, are so evidently unsuccessful in their attempts to make men virtuous: for, if they had apostolical endowments, yea angelic capacities, eloquence, and purity; they, their whole system, and all who cleave to it, lie under the awful and explicit curse of God: and this must blight all their labors, and finally ruin their souls, unless they are previously convinced of their fatal mistake.—While we zealously preach and diligently practise "good works," for evangelical purposes; let us be even still more careful, if possible, not to put any thing which we do, in the place of "that righteousness of God which is unto and upon all that believe;" and not to advance any thing, which may betray others into so fatal a delusion. (Notes, Rom. 3:21—26. Phil. 3:8—11.)—Instead of presumptuously applying the apostle's authoritative and most awful words to those who differ from us, or in any other way than by a general declaration of the truth; let us for ourselves keep at the utmost distance from the terrible anathema, and caution all men against those who thus "pervert the gospel of Christ." In so important a cause, we must not regard the friendship, or fear the frowns of men; nor seek their favor, by the persuasive words of human wisdom: but be satisfied with desiring and hoping for the acceptance and blessing of God, in our endeavors to vindicate his truth. (Note, 2 Cor. 5:16.) Indeed, none are "the servants of Christ," who seek "to please men" as their object; and few who actually "please men in general, give sufficient evidence that they honestly and faithfully serve Christ: for how can he be pleased with that testimony and conduct, which is acceptable to carnal men, in whom "the god of this world" dwells and works? Ministers therefore should be careful not to receive or preach a carnalized gospel; and not to rest in human teaching, but to study the written revelation of Jesus Christ, and to pray continually for "the Spirit of wisdom and revelation" in the knowledge of him; that they may "please men" only for their good, and to their edification, and not desire to please them any further. (Note, Rom. 15:1—3.)

V. 11--24.

The "conversation" and habitual conduct of many who are now eminent Christians and ministers, was once most contrary to the truth and grace of the gospel. Zealous Pharisees and furious persecutors have been made monuments of the Redeemer's power and love: and though their apparent profiting in some unscriptural or antiscritptural system of theology, and in the general knowledge connected with such studies, before their conversion, tended only to their own greater condemnation, and to render them more dangerous and zealous opponents of the truth: yet it has afterwards been over-ruled for the glory of God and their more abundant usefulness.—The Lord suffers many, whom he has chosen for his work, to proceed in opposition to him for a course of years: but when "he calls them by his grace," and reveals the glory and preciousness of Christ to their souls; their enmity is subdued, their lusts dethroned, their hearts changed, and they willingly devote themselves to his service. When his command is concerned, they do not "confer with flesh and blood," but renounce all worldly prospects, and venture all consequences for his sake. And though, in ordinary cases, it would be presumptuous for new converts, or young ministers, to disregard the counsels of such as have before been employed in the work of Christ; yet that love to Christ and the souls of men, which renders them superior to lucrative considerations, and ready to endure hardships in order to spread the gospel; is a good evidence, that the Lord is preparing them for future usefulness.—In speaking of the Lord's dealings with us, and the services for which he has enabled us; we should scrupulously adhere to the truth, as in the sight of God: and when they, who opposed and would have destroyed the faith, are brought to embrace and preach it; we are called upon to "glorify God on their behalf," though they be unknown by face to us.

CHAP. II.

The apostle shows for what purpose he, after many years, again went up to Jerusalem, 1, 2; and that Titus, who attended him was not circumcised; lest the freedom of the Gentile converts from the law should be grieved, 3—5. No additional knowledge or authority was communicated to him by the other apostles; but they acknowledged his divine mission to the Gentiles, 6—10. At Antioch, he openly withstood Peter; who dissembled, as to communion with the Gentile converts, for fear of some from among the Jews, and induced others to dissemble, 11—13; expostulating with him, because he, who himself sought justification by "faith in Christ," led others to seek it by the works of the law, 14—16. The apostle, by the law was "become dead to the law, that he might live to God;" being "crucified with Christ, yet living, Christ living in him; and he living by faith in Christ, and not frustrating the grace of God," 17—21.

2 And I went up <sup>e</sup> by revelation, <sup>f</sup> and communicated unto them that gospel which I preach among the Gentiles, but <sup>g</sup> privately to them <sup>h</sup> which were of reputation, lest by any means <sup>i</sup> I should run, or had run, in vain.

3 But <sup>j</sup> neither Titus, who was with me, being a Greek, was compelled to be circumcised:

5 To whom <sup>o</sup> we gave place by subjection, no, not for an hour; <sup>p</sup> that the truth of the gospel might continue with you.

Note.—It appears from the history, that Paul and Barnabas went up from Antioch to carry the alms of the Christians in that city to the elders at Jerusalem. But they had at that time no special business with the apostles, and it is not certain that they saw any of them. (Note, Acts 11:27—30.) The journey however here mentioned, most evidently is that recorded by the historian, when they went up on purpose about the very question, which St. Paul was here debating with the Galatians. (Marg. Ref. c.—Note, Acts 15:1—11.)—Most expositors date this journey, fourteen years after the apostle's conversion, which scarcely allows sufficient time for all the intervening transactions; and it seems more obvious to compute the years, from the first journey before-mentioned. (Note, 1: 15—24.) There is, however, but little certainty in the computation of times, even by the most learned chronologers, as to the date of the apostle's conversion, subsequent history, and the writing of his epistles; and exactness in this respect is comparatively of little importance.—By the direction of God, who immediately revealed himself to the apostle, or some other prophet, on this occasion, he and Barnabas went to Jerusalem about the question of the Gentile converts being required to obey the ritual law of Moses: and this was the only instance, in which there had been the least appearance of inferiority in him to the other apostles. At that time, he fully declared the whole of "that gospel, which he preached among the Gentiles," to them, and to other eminent persons at Jerusalem: but he did this "privately;" lest, if he had openly avowed it to the whole church, especially respecting the virtual abrogation of the ceremonial law; the strong prejudices of the multitude against him and the Gentiles, and for the Mosaic law, should have excited commotions, and led to such measures, as might have prevented his future usefulness, and even to subvert the churches which he had already planted. It would at length be fully known, both that he admitted the Gentiles into the church without circumcision, and that he did not consider the Mosaic law as binding on the conscience even of the Jewish converts. But, as his object was to obtain the sanction of the church at Jerusalem to his doctrine, in order to silence the Judaizing teachers, it was very prudent to open the business privately to the apostles; that, being proposed and supported by them, it might come before the other elders with more weight than Paul himself could give it in so prejudiced an audience. Yet, while he used this precaution, he would not consent that Titus should be circumcised, contrary to his judgment and inclination: and probably he took that excellent Gentile convert with him on purpose, that in the case of one on whom he could depend, he might show his steadfastness to his principles, on so critical an occasion. (Marg. Ref. c—i. —Notes, Acts 16:1—3. 2 Cor. 2:12,13. 7:13—16. 8:16—24. 12:17—21. Tit. Preface. Note, 1:1—4.) For both his journey to Jerusalem and his conduct there, especially in respect of Titus, were intended to counteract the designs of “false brethren,” professed Christians and teachers, who had, in an unsuspected manner, got admission into the church at Antioch; and who came as spies to observe the liberty, which the Gentile converts, and even those of the Jews, used in respect of the law, according to the truth and will of Christ; in order that they might bring the Gentiles into bondage to the legal ceremonies, as well as oblige the apostle and his coadjutors, to be more observant of them. (Marg. Ref. k—n.) He was indeed always disposed to make allowance for men’s prejudices, and to deal gently with weak consciences, in order to promote the gospel: (Note, 1 Cor. 9:19—23.) but he would not give place at all, “by way of subjection” to the law, or to those, who imposed it on men’s consciences, and represented it as necessary to salvation. Nay, he strenuously resisted all such attempts; in order that “the truth of the gospel,” which these Jewish teachers were laboring to pervert and corrupt, might remain in the Gentile churches. 6 But of those <sup>a</sup> who seemed to be somewhat, whatsoever they were, <sup>r</sup> it maketh no matter to me: <sup>s</sup> God accepteth no man’s person: for they who seemed to be somewhat, <sup>t</sup> in conference added nothing to me:

7 But contrariwise, <sup>u</sup> when they saw that <sup>x</sup> the gospel of the uncircumcision was committed unto me, as the gospel of the circumcision was unto Peter;

9 And when <sup>a</sup> James, Cephas, and John, who seemed to be <sup>b</sup> pillars, perceived <sup>c</sup> the grace that was given unto me, they gave to me and Barnabas the right hands of <sup>d</sup> fellowship, that <sup>e</sup> we should go unto the heathen, and they unto the circumcision.

10 Only they would <sup>f</sup> that we should remember the poor; the same which I also was forward to do. [Practical Observations.]

Note.—The false brethren disparaged Paul, as if little account was to be made of him; but Peter, James, and John “seemed to be somewhat” in their estimation. This marked distinction was made, in order that by using the names of these apostles they might the more successfully oppose the truth: for the opinion of others concerning them, not their own estimate of themselves, is exclusively meant. (Marg. Ref. q, r.) But St. Paul declared, that it was “no matter to him,” what they or others were, as to their endowments, authority, or reputation: for God did not thus partially accept of men’s persons; or determine right and wrong, truth and falsehood, by the repute in which they who taught them were held. (Marg. Ref. s.) However highly therefore he loved and honored Peter, James, and John, as brethren and faithful eminent servants of their common Lord, he would not put them in Christ’s stead, or acknowledge that they had any authority over him: (Note, 2 Cor. 5:16.) nor indeed, when he conferred with them, had they added, or attempted to add, any thing to his knowledge of the gospel, or authority to preach it, or even to his spiritual gifts and miraculous powers. (Notes, Acts 15:12—29.) On the contrary, they were convinced that Christ had immediately appointed him to be his apostle, and principal minister in preaching the gospel among the Gentiles; even as Peter was the leading person in the work carrying on among the Jews; and had qualified him as fully, and wrought by him as mightily, in the one case, as he had Peter in the other. (Marg. Ref. x—z.) So that these three apostles, “who seemed” to many persons “to be pillars,” on whom every thing depended, saw and acknowledged the grace of God bestowed on Paul; and allowed of him and Barnabas, as fellow-laborers, of equal authority and ability with themselves; being satisfied that they should labor principally among the Gentiles, while themselves would at present continue among the Jews. Only, considering the low condition of the Jewish converts, and the expenses which they had incurred soon after the day of Pentecost; they desired them to remember and raise some contributions for their poor, among the Gentile converts; which Paul was very ready to do, and accordingly did without delay, and with great earnestness, notwithstanding their prejudices against him.—The event of this conference in other respects was well known. 11 ¶ But when Peter was come to Antioch, I withstood him to the face, because he was to be blamed.

12 For before that certain came from James, he did eat with the Gentiles: but when they were come, he withdrew, and separated himself, fearing them which were of the circumcision.

13 And the other Jews dissembled likewise with him: insomuch that Barnabas also was carried away with their dissimulation.

14 But when I saw that they walked not uprightly, according to the truth of the gospel, I said unto Peter before them all, If thou, being a Jew, livest after the manner of Gentiles, and not as do the Jews; why compellest thou the Gentiles to live as do the Jews?

15 We who are Jews by nature, and not sinners of the Gentiles, 16 Knowing that a man is not justified by the works of the law, but by the faith of Jesus Christ, even we have believed in Jesus Christ; that we might be justified by the faith of Christ, and not by the works of the law: for by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified.

[Practical Observations.]

pretended infallibility and supremacy, as derived from Peter, (no one can tell in what manner,) to be the most groundless fiction imaginable; and it tends exceedingly to establish the doctrine of justification by faith alone.—After the decree of the council at Jerusalem, Peter on some account went down to Antioch; and, knowing that the Mosaic law was no longer obligatory on the conscience, he did not scruple to eat and converse freely with the Gentiles. (Notes, Acts 10:9—23. 11:1—17. 15:1—29.) Yet, when certain Jewish converts came from James to him, he “separated” from the Gentiles, lest he should incur the censure of the Jews. Thus he showed more fear of man, than regard to the truth of the gospel; (Notes, Prov. 24:24, 25. Is. 57:11, 12. Matt. 26:69—75.) he confirmed the prejudices of the Jewish converts, and strengthened the hands of the Judaizing teachers; he weakened the influence of St. Paul and other ministers; he set an example of dissimulation, which was followed by the other Jews; and which even seduced Barnabas himself, who had been St. Paul's coadjutor among the Gentiles; and he threw additional hindrances in the way of their conversion. This sufficiently proved him to be both fallible and sinful in himself; though he was guided by the Spirit of God to deliver the gospel to mankind, free from error or corrupt mixture. (Note, Matt. 16:18, 19.) As, however, he was so evidently blameable, Paul, though probably a much younger man, and called to the apostleship long after Peter, deemed himself bound openly to withstand him. (Marg. Ref. h, i.) A private remonstrance would not suffice, on so public and important an occasion; and he would not speak against him behind his back. (Note, Matt. 18:15—17.) But he took an opportunity, in the presence of the whole church, to expostulate with him concerning his disingenuous conduct, demanding of him, how it was that he, being a Jew, should in many respects and on many occasions live like the Gentiles, without observing the Mosaic law; and yet should inconsistently employ the influence of his example and authority, to induce, and even to “compel,” the Gentile converts to submit to circumcision and obey that law. (Marg. Ref. k—u.) For they, who were naturally of the stock of Israel, and thus had been born and educated Jews; and who had formerly been strictly observant of the Mosaic law, and not idolatrous sinners like the Gentiles; being at length fully convinced, that a man could not be justified before God by his own obedience, in any sense; (Note, Rom. 3:19—31.) but that this blessing must be obtained by the faith of Jesus Christ; even they had renounced all dependence on the law, and fled to Christ by faith, that they might be justified in him alone, without the works of the law. Why then should Peter, and other Jewish converts, draw the attention of the Gentiles to the legal ceremonies; and intimate to them, that they were not fully brought into the church of Christ, because they did not submit to them? Did not this sanction those teachers, who instructed them to depend on them, in part at least for justification? Whereas, they well knew, that "by the works of the law no flesh could be justified before God." (Marg. Ref. x —e.)—The occasion of this declaration was doubtless taken from the ceremonial law: but the argument, as it respects justification, is equally conclusive against all dependence on the works of the moral law, as absolutely inconsistent with the method of justification according to the gospel.—This certainly took place some years before the apostle's last journey to Jerusalem as recorded by St. Luke; and it is an additional argument, in support of the view before given of St. Paul's conduct at that juncture. (Note, Acts 21:17—26.)—The conduct of Paul, on this trying occasion, seems to have been peculiarly excellent.—Sinners of the Gentiles. (15) As distinguished from "sinners," who were not "Gentiles." 17 But if <sup>d</sup> while we seek to be justified by Christ, we ourselves also <sup>e</sup> are found sinners, <sup>f</sup> is therefore Christ the minister of sin? <sup>g</sup> God forbid.

19 For <sup>i</sup> through the law am <sup>k</sup> dead to the law, <sup>l</sup>that I might live unto God.

liveth in me: and <sup>p</sup> the life which I now live in the flesh, <sup>q</sup> I live by the faith of <sup>r</sup> the Son of God, <sup>s</sup> who loved me, and gave himself for me.

21 I <sup>t</sup> do not frustrate the grace of God: for if <sup>u</sup> righteousness come by the law, then <sup>v</sup> Christ is dead in vain.

Note.—It is not agreed among expositors, whether the apostle's address to Peter continues to the end of the chapter, or where it terminates if it does not: but the doctrine is the same, however this may be decided.—If then, while the apostles and their converts from among the Jews renounced their legal confidence, and sought to be justified by Christ; it should at length be found, that they were yet sinners, unpardoned, unjustified, through the insufficiency of his righteousness and atonement to justify them, or of faith to give them an interest in it; except they returned back to the law, and taught the Gentile converts to Judaize: it would follow, that Christ was "the minister of sin," and the Gospel "the ministration of condemnation," instead of "the ministration of the Spirit," and "of righteousness." (Marg. Ref. d—f.—Notes, 1 Cor. 15:12—18. 2 Cor. 3:7—11.)—But "God forbid," that such things should be spoken of Christ and his gospel! This appears to be the meaning of the verse, as it stands connected in the apostle's argument. At first sight indeed it may seem rather to relate to the sins, which are found in those who profess to be justified by Christ. These should not be charged on the doctrine, or on the insufficiency of his grace to sanctify them; as if he were "the minister of sin," and allowed men to continue in it; or as if there was any need to go back to the law on that account. The former interpretation, however, is most approved, and indeed justly. 'Christ is 'then "the Minister of sin," and not of justification.'—'Must it not follow that he is so if he 'hath introduced an imperfect dispensation, 'which will not sufficiently ensure the happiness of those that follow it. Yea, doth he not 'indeed teach sin, if justification indeed cannot 'be obtained without the law, in teaching men 'to renounce all dependence on it, as it is certain by his gospel he doth?' Doddridge.—If then Paul, or the other apostles, should, either by doctrine or example, countenance the opinion, that the law must be obeyed, in order to justification; thus "building again what they had destroyed," they would become transgressors, and liable to condemnation. And if Christians from among the Jews should return back to a dependence on the law; they would vainly attempt to erect again that old building which they had destroyed, in order to make Christ their Foundation; (Marg. Ref. h.—Note, Rom. 10:1—4.) which would again bring them under condemnation, and leave their sins both unpardoned and unsubdued. (Note, 5:1—6.)—

This was indeed very different from the apostle's own experience in this matter: for, through his knowledge of the strictness, extent, spirituality, excellency, and sanction of the moral law, as well as of the typical import of the ceremonies, he was become "dead to the law;" he expected no help from it in the matter of justification; and he was divorced from it as a legal covenant, that he might welcome Christ and his salvation. The union between him and the law, in this sense, was finally dissolved, as the marriage relation is by death. (Notes, Rom. 3:19, 20. 7:1-4.) He hoped and feared nothing from it; any more than a dead man did, from his friends or his enemies. (Note, Rom. 6:1-4.) But the effect of this was not a careless lawless life: on the contrary, this "dying to the law" was necessary, in order "that he might live to God," and be devoted to him, through the motives, encouragements, and grace of the gospel. (Marg. Ref. i-l.) Indeed, he was even "crucified with Christ:" the demands of the law on him had been answered by his Surety, in his obedience unto the death upon the cross; and his union with Christ had made him die to all legal dependences, as well as to the love and friendship of the world, the delights and interest of sin, and all those carnal principles from which his former activity arose. (Marg. Ref. m, n.—Notes, 5:22-26. 6:11-14. Rom. 6:5-7, 8-11. Col. 2:20-23.) "Nevertheless he lived," in a new and evangelical hope, by the communication of a divine life to his soul, by new capacities of enjoyment, and new motives and principles, and as it were main springs of activity. Yet, it was not so much he that lived, as "Christ who lived in him," by his Spirit, and his power and grace, regulating his judgment and affections, transforming him into his own image, and employing him as the instrument of his glory. (Marg. Ref. o.—Notes, John 6:52-58, v. 56. 14:21-24, v. 23. 17:22, 23. 2 Cor. 13:5, 6. Eph. 2:19-22. 3:14-19, v. 17. Col. 1:25-27, v. 27. 1 John 4:9-17, v. 12-16. Rev. 3:20-22, v. 20.) So that the life, which he then "lived in the flesh," surrounded with worldly objects and temptations, was not conducted upon carnal principles, or by a regard to external things, but "by the faith of the Son of God;" as he depended on him for all things, and aimed to do all according to his will, and in subserviency to his glory. (Marg. Ref. p-s.—Notes, 2 Cor. 5:13-15. 10:1-6. Col. 3:16, 17.) And to this he was influenced by the consideration, that this glorious Saviour had loved him, when a bitter persecutor, and had given himself to the death upon the cross, as a sacrifice for his sins. So that, while he neglected no acceptable obedience, and declined no self-denying service, yet he attended to all his duties, from such principles and for such purposes, that "he did not frustrate" or set aside "the grace of God," by attempting in any measure to justify himself by his works; being fully assured, that if righteousness could have been obtained by any obedience of man "to law" of whatever kind, consistently with the glory of God, then Christ had died without any necessity, and to no purpose. (Marg. Ref. t-x.) As therefore no Christian could suppose, that so stupendous a plan as that of redemption was formed and executed, without any occasion; it must also be concluded, ed, that righteousness could in no degree be obtained by a sinner, on account of his obedience to any law. This holds equally true of the moral, as of the ceremonial law, and indeed of every rule which can be prescribed for the conduct of men in any age or nation. It was of small moment whether men observed the ritual law or not, except as they depended on it: and the concluding part of the apostle's argument related to the moral law, at least equally with the ceremonial.—"I through the law have died by law; so that I must live by God." (19)—"We all, through breaking law, have died by 'the curse of law; so that, if we live, we must 'live by the free gift of God, and not by law.' Macknight. If this learned and laborious writer had made it intelligible what he meant by 'have died by the curse of the law;' his novel interpretation would have required further notice. But the author owns himself unable to affix any precise meaning to the words used, in this and in several places of his translation and paraphrase. "I have died to the law" is explained by "I have been crucified with Christ." The minister. (17) ἄνατος. Matt. 20:26. Rom. 15:8.—I destroyed. (18) κατελθω. *Matt. 5:17. 24:2. 26:61. ## PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-10.

Whilst we simply depend on God to prosper our labors, we should use every prudent method of obviating misapprehensions, and counteracting the designs of opposers, "lest by any means, we should run in vain:" and this may commonly be connected with decided firmness in important cases.—False brethren and teachers are generally "brought in unawares." We must expect spies in our congregations, who come on purpose to find something to cavil at, or object to; in order to deprive us of our Christian liberty, by bringing us into bondage to human impositions, or groundless fears; or through extravagant notions of liberty, to keep men in slavery to sin and Satan. We must not "give place," in such matters, "by way of subjection," in any measure; lest "the truth of the gospel" should be obscured or disgraced.—"False brethren" often profess an undue regard to ministers of established reputation; in order to disparage others perhaps of equal ability and faithfulness, whose line of duty requires them to proceed in a somewhat different manner. But they should be shown, "that God accepteth no man's person:" and that all the servants are as nothing, in comparison of their common Lord; who will never approve of those, who "call man master upon earth," that they may more effectually counteract the zealous endeavors of others who are "fellow-laborers of God." (Note, 1 Cor. 3:4-9.) The question is not, Who said or who did such and such things? but merely, What was said and done? and, did it accord to the word of God, or not? Frequently those ministers, whom captious or injudicious persons magnify against others, "in conference add nothing to them;" nor indeed do they materially differ from them; except as the different descriptions of men, among whom they labor, induce them to conduct their work with some circumstantial variations. And they generally see that God hath called them to their different spheres of usefulness, and become mutually desirous, by love and good offices, to strengthen each other's hands; while many ignorantly suppose, or maliciously declare, that they are opposing one another. But, whether our differences of sentiment be real, or imaginary; we should all be "forward to remember the poor," especially such as have impoverished themselves for the sake of the gospel; even should they have imbibed strong prejudices against us and "our work and labor of love."

V. 11—16.

"The fear of man bringeth a snare," to an extent of which few are fully aware: and we need not wonder to see pious persons ashamed, or afraid, openly to countenance those whom they inwardly favor; or boldly to avow themselves on controverted points, when their opinions are unpopular: for Peter himself even at an advanced period of his most zealous, bold, and useful ministry was induced thus to prevaricate! But even a man equal to an apostle, or "the chiefest of the apostles," who "walks not uprightly according to the gospel," is to be blamed and condemned, in this respect, and "withstood to his face," when the matter is evident and important: for the more eminent he is, the greater mischief will follow from the example; so that other distinguished persons also will "be carried away" with such a sanctioned "dissimulation."—Public offences must be publicly reprov'd, that the evil may be effectually counteracted. (Note, 1 Tim. 5:19,20.)—We must "cease from man," and "know no one after the flesh," if we would follow the Lord fully; for "verily every man in his best estate is altogether vanity." Christ is the only infallible Head of his church: all pretenders to this title on earth are antichrists; and they, who cannot endure to be blamed, or to acknowledge themselves mistaken, are of a very unchristian temper. Men are seldom aware of the magnitude or fatal consequences of their errors or carnal compliances: yet they should be fairly pointed out to them, that they may be put upon their guard. Whatever be our nation, religious profession, education, or outward character; if real and established Christians, we know that "by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified." This conviction has led us to believe in Christ, and rely on him, that we "might be justified by faith" in him: and, while we adhere to this principle, all our most spiritual worship and devoted zealous obedience will be entirely disregarded by us in the grand concern of justification, and be wholly performed from other motives and to other purposes; namely, to show the sincerity of our grateful adoring love, to "adorn the gospel of God our Saviour," to glorify God, and to do what good we can to our brethren and to all men.

V. 17—21.

We make "Christ the Minister of sin," if we suppose that his righteousness and atonement are insufficient to justify the believer: even as others make him the "Minister of sin," by allowing themselves in disobedience, from a presumptuous confidence of being justified by his righteousness, and saved without being sanctified.—The believer, "through the law, is become dead to the law," not that he may continue in sin, but that "he may live unto God;" and the more simply he relies on Christ for every thing, the more devotedly does he walk before him, in all his ordinances and commandments. He is "crucified with Christ," to the world and sin, as well as to all legal dependencies and proud confidence. His ambition, avarice, and desire of sensual or dissipated pleasure, and of pomp or power, with every angry, or malignant passion, the great and efficacious springs of human activity, are mortified, and as it were broken and deprived of energy: so that, if other principles equally operative were not implanted, he would be almost without stimulus to any kind or degree of activity. But he is united with Christ and conformed to him; he, as it were, rises, lives, and ascends with Christ; yea, Christ lives and reigns in him, and speaks and acts by him: and, as far as he is brought under this sacred influence, his words and works resemble those of his Lord, and all his powers are employed in his service. He lives here on earth, "by faith in the Son of God," which "worketh by love," love of God and of man; this induces zealous active obedience, and effects a progressive transformation into his holy image: and this proportionably enables him to use the language of full assurance, and to say, "He loved me, and gave himself for me." Thus he neither perverts nor "frustrates the grace of God;" for this proposition, "that if righteousness come by the law, then Christ is dead in vain," is the bane of all self-justifying schemes, however refined or ingenious they be: and all who cleave to them would certainly have deemed this language to be enthusiasm, if the apostle had not used it concerning his own experience; and if it had first been spoken by some zealous modern defender of the doctrine of grace against the objections of Pharisees, and the perversions of Antinomians.

CHAP. III.

The apostle sharply reproves the Galatians, for departing from that gospel which had been fully preached to them, and confirmed by the gift of the Holy Spirit, 1—5. He proves the doctrine of justification by faith alone, from the example of Abraham, and the testimony of scripture, 6—8; from the curse of the law, and the redemption of Christ, 10—14; and from the Abrahamic covenant, which the law could not disannul, 15—18. He states the use of the law, in connexion with the covenant of grace; shows that all men are by the law shut up under sin, till Christ releases them; and describes the law as a school-master to bring men to him, that they may be justified by faith, 19—24; and that all believers are delivered from the law, and made the spiritual seed of Abraham by faith in Christ, 25—29.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—Having authenticated his ministry and doctrine, by a statement of facts, the apostle proceeded more directly to argue the point with the Galatians; whom he sharply reproved, as destitute of wisdom and understanding, in thus unaccountably turning away from the truth of Christ. He demanded therefore, “who had bewitched them,” by the sorcery of their insidious insinuations, “that they should not obey the truth,” which required them to seek justification by faith in Christ alone. For it certainly could be owing to nothing less than fascination, for them to seek it “by the works of the law;” seeing the gospel had been so fully explained, and earnestly enforced upon them; and all things relating to the sufferings of Christ, and the need, motive, intensesness, and benefit of them, had been set before them, in so distinct, pathetic, affecting, and lively a manner, by the preaching of the gospel, and the administration of the Lord’s supper; that “Jesus Christ had,” as it were, been “evidently set forth, as crucified before their eyes,” and in the midst of them. And could it have been previously imagined, that the impressions, which seemed to be thus made upon their minds, would so soon be erased? (Marg. Ref. a—d.)—The argument, however, might be reduced to a very compendious decision: the apostle only desired to know from them, whether they had received the miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit, by the laying on of the hands of those preachers, who proselyted them to the Jewish law; or from him, who brought them the joyful report of free salvation by faith in Christ? (Marg. Ref. e, f.—Notes, Rom. 10:5—17.) As they must know, that they received these gifts by him, and not by their legal teachers; could they be so absurd, as to suppose, that they had indeed begun to worship and serve God, in a spiritual and acceptable manner, by the preaching of a doctrine warranted and evidently attested by the Holy Spirit; but that the work had been left imperfect, and was now to be completed by teachers, who possessed no miraculous powers, at least could impart none to others; and who only instructed them in external ordinances, a bodily exercise, of which carnal men were as capable as the most spiritual man on earth! (Marg. Ref. g.—Note, Phil.

3:—7, v. 3.) They had, indeed, endured many persecutions, especially from the Jews: and would they at length prove their profession of Christianity to be “vain,” and lose all the benefit of their sufferings, by renouncing the grace of the gospel, to rely, in part at least, on legal observances? The apostle hoped that it would not yet be thus “in vain;” but it certainly must be so, unless they could be recovered from the fatal mistake. (Marg. Ref. h.—Note, 5:1—6.) He must therefore again demand of them, whether the supply of the Spirit, and miraculous powers, had been given them from the Lord, by means of the preachers of legal observances, or by the ministers of the gospel.—This open appeal to the Galatians, who were under the influence of those, who opposed the apostle’s authority, is a full demonstration, that these gifts were actually communicated to them by his ministry. The abruptness and repetitions of his questions also prove, that his mind was greatly agitated by their misconduct, and show how important he deemed their mistake; and we cannot doubt that he regarded all their profession, and sufferings in consequence of it, to be altogether in vain, in case they persisted in it.—This is of the greatest importance in the argument: for submission to the ceremonial law, though burthensome, would not have been a renunciation of the gospel, if it had not implied a dependence on their own works, instead of the righteousness and propitiatory sacrifice of Christ; and this dependence must be equally incompatible with the grace of the gospel, even when the obedience itself is necessary from other motives, and for other purposes.—Obeys the truth. (1) The truth is obeyed when its directions are observed; but disobeyed, when these are neglected, in order to render obedience to other directors or injunctions. faith, <sup>s</sup> preached before the gospel unto Abraham, saying, <sup>t</sup> In thee shall all nations be blessed.

Note.—“Abraham believed God,” &c. (Notes, Gen. 15:5,6. Rom. 4:1—5.) The example of Abraham was sufficient to determine, that those who sought justification by faith only, were his children, and interested in the blessings promised to him: and the Holy Spirit, who inspired the writers of the scriptures, foreseeing the calling of the Gentiles, and their “justification by faith in Christ,” preached “before the gospel unto Abraham” in few words, when God said, “In thee shall all nations be blessed:” that is, ‘By virtue of their relation to the promised Seed, which shall descend from thee, sinners of all nations shall, through faith, be made completely happy in the favor of God, and the enjoyment of everlasting life.’ (Marg. Ref. p.—Notes, Gen. 12:1—3. 18:18,19. 22:16—18.) So then they, who sought acceptance in this way of simply believing, were blessed after the example of “believing Abraham.” (Notes, 26—29. Rom. 4:14—17.)—The scripture foreseeing, &c. 10 For <sup>x</sup> as many as are of the works of the law are <sup>y</sup> under the curse: for it is written, <sup>z</sup> Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law to do them.

14 That <sup>i</sup> the blessing of Abraham might

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—Instead of the blessedness of Abraham, all they, even of his posterity, who sought to be justified by their own obedience “to the works of the law,” with all those who in any way remained under the covenant of works, abode under the curse, according to the testimony of the law itself. (Marg. Ref. x—z.—Note, Deut. 27:26.) The passage here quoted follows a variety of curses denounced against transgressors of the moral law; which shows that this was principally referred to. Indeed, the legal dispensation, considered as a covenant of works, was intended: believers were always under the covenant of grace, by faith in the Saviour as promised from the beginning, and prefigured especially by the sacrificing of innocent animals: unbelievers always made the whole law a complex covenant of works; and the nation of Israel was under the Sinai-covenant, in respect of the land of Canaan, and their peculiar privileges. (Notes, Ex. 19:5, 20:1.) But after the promulgation of the gospel, the whole became entirely a covenant of works, even as much as that of Adam. (Note, 4:21—31.) Under a covenant of this kind, in one form or other, all men continue, as the rational and accountable creatures of God; and, being transgressors of his law, even according to their own obscure notions of it, they are exposed to the curse and wrath of God, and remain under it, unless they believe in Christ. (Note, Rom. 2:12—16.) But as the apostle was arguing with Judaizers, he led their attention to the written law itself; which could not confer the blessing, but must denounce the curse upon them: for they had not “confirmed it,” or “continued” from the beginning of their lives to that day; and would not to the end of life continue, “in all things written in the law,” so as to perform a perfect obedience to them.—It was therefore evident, at the first glance, that no man could be justified by a law, which peremptorily demanded an obedience so absolute and perfect, as no mere man ever yet rendered to it. But it was further evident, as God had declared another way of justification and eternal life. (Marg. Ref. x—z.—Notes, Hab. 2:4. Rom. 1:17. Heb. 10:35—39.) Now “the way of faith,” by which alone the most righteous of our fallen race can live before God, is perfectly distinct from, yea opposite to that of the law, which never proposes life, but upon the terms of perfect obedience. (Marg. Ref. a—d.—Notes, Lev. 18:5. Matt. 19:16—22. Mark 10:23—34. Luke 10:25—29. Rom. 10:5—11.) Every one, therefore, who has not performed this condition, is “under the curse;” but “Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law,” or bought us off by a price paid, having been willingly “made a curse” in our stead. For, as it was the purpose of God thus to deliver men from wrath, by the ignominious and agonizing sufferings of his beloved Son upon the cross, and all the punishment which he then endured: so he declared that kind of punishment to be “accursed,” and an emblem of his most dreadful vengeance, when it was written, “Cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree.” (Marg. Ref. e—h.—Note, Deut. 21:22,23.) Thus, when the holy and divine Saviour was suspended on the cross, it appeared that he endured “the curse of the law” in our stead. In this most wonderful and gracious manner the way was opened for “the blessing of Abraham,” even the “righteousness of faith,” and friendship with God, to be conferred, not only on the Jews, but on the Gentiles also, through Christ and “by faith in him;” and that they too might receive the promised gifts of the Spirit, by faith, to seal to them the truth of the gospel; and his sanctifying grace, to seal to them their own free justification. (Marg. Ref. i—l.—Notes, 1—5. Acts 2:14—21. 2 Cor. 1:23,24. Jam. 2:21—24.)—It is evident, that the apostle supposed the Gentiles to be “under the curse of the law,” as well as the Jews, but in another form; else they would not have needed this redemption and justification.—The just, &c. (11) Or, “the just by faith shall live.” This is the more exact translation: and as “the righteousness of faith” does not secure men from temporal death, in any form, or at any time; so deliverance from eternal condemnation, and to eternal life in heaven, must be intended.—Curse of, &c. (13) As Christ died, not to deliver us from temporal death, but from “the wrath to come;” it is manifest, that “the curse of the law,” whether the law of Moses, or any law under which men are supposed to be, is eternal damnation, and not temporal or temporary punishment. Christ indeed did not suffer eternal damnation; for, being God as well as man, his temporary sufferings constituted an infinite satisfaction to divine justice, and the fullest display of the evil of sin, and the honor of the divine law which can be conceived.—Many expositors, who contend against the imputation of Christ’s righteousness to believers, in disputing against Socinians, argue for the vicarious sufferings of Christ in our stead. Now what is this but imputation? He, though perfectly holy, paid the debt which we sinners had contracted. “It was exacted, and he became answerable.” We sinners, on believing, are “made the righteousness of God in him,” and receive the inheritance which he merited. Thus there is a reciprocal imputation. (Notes, Is. 53:4—12. 2 Cor. 5:18—21, v. 21. 1 Pet. 2:18—25, v. 24. 3:17,18.) Yet, as the imputation of sin did not render the Saviour either criminal or polluted, but had its effect merely in his receiving the punishment which we deserved, so the imputation of his righteousness does not render us free either from criminality or pollution; but merely entitles us to the reward of his righteousness. We have still the same need of humiliation and repentance, of sanctification, and personal obedience and holiness, without which we have no evidence that we are made the righteousness of God in him.—I wonder that Jerome and Erasmus should labor, and seek for I know not what figure of speech, to show that Christ was not called “accursed.” Truly in this is placed all our hope: in this the infinite love of God is manifested; in this is placed our salvation, that our God, properly and without any figure, poured out all his wrath in his own Son; ... caused him, ... to be accursed, that he might receive us into favor. Finally, without any figure, “Christ was made a curse for us,” in such a manner, that unless he had been truly God, he must have remained under the curse forever, from which for our sakes he emerged. For indeed, if the obedience of the Son of God be figurative and imaginary, so must our hope of glory be. Beza.—The Spirit. (14) The departure of the Spirit of life and holiness, when Adam sinned, left him spiritually dead, and proved him a condemned criminal; the gift of the Spirit of life and holiness, in Christ Jesus, is the source of spiritual life, and the seal of his justification.—The miraculous or extraordinary gifts of the Spirit cannot, therefore, be exclusively meant; yet they are specially referred to. (Note, 1—5.)—Cursed is every one, &c. (10) Nearly from the LXX, which adds παισι to what is found in the Hebrew, which does not at all alter the meaning. (Note, Deut. 26:26.)—The just, &c. (11) Nearly from the LXX. (Hab. 2:4.)—Cursed is every one, &c. (13). This varies considerably from the LXX, but it conveys the exact meaning of the passage. 18 For <sup>y</sup> if the inheritance be of the law, it is no more of promise: <sup>z</sup> but God gave it to Abraham by promise.

Note.—The apostle proceeded to ground another argument upon the case of Abraham. Speaking of the high concerns of God's dealings with his creatures, after "the manner of men" when dealing with each other; he reminded the Galatians, that even a covenant between men, when fully ratified, could not be "disannulled," or have any new conditions added to it, without the explicit consent of all parties. Now the formal ratification of the covenant with Abraham, and its express promises to him and his seed, took place long before the Mosaic law; and could not therefore be altered or disannulled by it. Neither did the Lord include all the descendants of Abraham in these promises, as so many distinct kinds of seed: but they were limited to him, and "his Seed," in the singular number, which implied that Christ was principally meant, and others only as related to him, and regarded as one with him. (Marg. Ref. o, p.—Notes, Gen. 17:4—8. Rom. 9:6—14. 1 Cor. 12:12—26.) The unbelieving descendants of Jacob were no more interested in the most valuable promises, than the posterity of Ishmael and Esau were: while all believers, though of Gentile extraction, being one with Christ, were included in the Abrahamic covenant, without any concern in the Mosaic law, or the Sinai-covenant. (Notes, 26—29. Rom. 4:9—17. Heb. 6:12—20.) Now this covenant confirmed with Abraham, in respect of Christ and his salvation; the law, which was not given till four hundred and thirty years after the calling of Abraham, could not disannul, that the promise should be rendered of none effect. (Marg. Ref. q—x.—Notes, Gen. 15:11—16. Ex. 12:40.) For if the inheritance of heaven (which was typified by that of Canaan,) had depended on the law, and men's personal obedience to it: it could not have been secured to believers by the promise given to Abraham; and the new conditions, added to his covenant, would virtually have disannulled it.

22 But the scripture hath <sup>m</sup> concluded all under sin, <sup>n</sup> that the promise by faith of Jesus Christ might be given <sup>o</sup> to them that believe.

[Practical Observations.]

Note.—If then the promises were "spoken to Abraham and his Seed," and to all believers in him without any dependence on the law; what purpose did the law answer? and why was it promulgated? To this inquiry the apostle answered, that "it was added" to the covenant with Abraham, and rendered subservient to the accomplishment of it, in various particulars previously to the coming of Christ; though it made no alteration, as to the manner of a sinner's acceptance. The whole system served, "because of transgressions," to restrain the nation of Israel from universal idolatry and wickedness, and to preserve the worship of God among them, till the coming of Christ: the moral law was useful to convince men of sin, to show them their need of repentance, of mercy, and of a Saviour; the ceremonial law shadowed forth the way of acceptance and holiness; and believers were, in the worship thus instituted, enabled to maintain communion with God, by faith in the promised Messiah. (Marg. Ref. a, b.—Note, Rom. 5:20, 21.) Thus it pleased God, that things should remain, till the coming of that "Seed of Abraham," to whom especially the promises had respect: and the law was promulgated, and formed into a national covenant, at mount Sinai, by the ministration of angels, and by the intervention of Moses as a typical Mediator. (Marg. Ref. c—e.—Notes, Ex. 19: 20: 18—20. 24. Deut. 5:22—29. Acts 7:34—36. Heb. 2:1—4.)—It was, however, well known, that "a Mediator" was not appointed to act merely in behalf of one party in any covenant, but of two at least: yet only one party in the Abrahamic covenant, was present when the law was given; even God himself. For the nation of Israel was not the other contracting party in that covenant; unbelievers among them had no share in the principal blessings of it; and all believers in every age and nation were concerned in it, by virtue of their union with "the Seed," to whom the promise was made. (Marg. Ref. f, g.—Note, 26—29.) Moses might indeed mediate a covenant between God and Israel: but he was not authorized to alter or disannul the Abrahamic covenant; which therefore continued in force with all believers, after the giving of the law, exactly as before. (Notes, Ex. 19:5. 20:1.)—This does not imply, that Christ was not present, as JEHOVAH, and the great Agent in the giving of the law: but only that he acted in his legislative, and not in his mediatorial character, or as representing the whole body of believers.—If this then were the case, it might further be inquired, whether “the law was contrary to the promises of God,” and the accomplishment of them, to those who lived under that dispensation. To this the apostle answered, “God forbid!” ‘Let that thought be ‘rejected with abhorrence.’ The Sinai-covenant was distinct from the Abrahamic: the moral law, as the standard of duty, was distinct from the gospel, the foundation of a sinner’s hope: and the shadows of the ceremonies, from Christ the Substance: but they were not contrary to each other. Nay, the law in every sense was subservient to the promises, and the performance of them to believers: it was good in itself and for the ends purposed by it; but it was never intended to “give life” to men; because all have broken it, and are prone to break it. For “if such a law had been given, as could have given life, verily righteousness,” or justification unto life, “would have been by the law;” and the whole plan of redemption by Christ would have been superfluous. But whether the Mosaic dispensation, as unconnected with the gospel; or the moral precepts and sanctions; or the ceremonies; or any other part of the Old Testament, was duly attended to; its uniform tenor “concluded,” or shut up, all men, of every national character, “under sin;” under the guilt of their actual transgressions, and the power of their evil propensities, as in a strong prison, from which no law could give them deliverance. Yet even this was intended to recommend the gospel, that the promise of pardon, righteousness, liberty, grace, and eternal life, by faith in the promised Saviour, being proposed to men, when “shut up,” as condemned criminals in prison, without hope or possibility of escape, might be freely performed to all who by faith acceded to the proposal; while all others must be left under the condemnation and the power of sin, without remedy. 23 But before <sup>p</sup> faith came, we were kept <sup>q</sup> under the law, shut up unto <sup>r</sup> the faith which should afterwards be revealed.

25 But after that <sup>u</sup> faith is come, <sup>x</sup> we are no longer under a school-master.

Note.—Before the great Object and Author of “faith” was come, and the doctrine of “faith” fully declared, the nation of Israel, the visible church, was kept under the legal dispensation: and, not only were unbelievers shut up under the curse of the law, as at other times; but even believers were held in a state of comparative darkness and discipline. Through the promises and ceremonies, they received a measure of light and encouragement; and thus they looked forward to that brighter day which was predicted: while the nation at large was “shut up,” by the institutions and sanctions of the law, and so, restrained from total apostasy, till the coming of Christ and the full revelation of the doctrine of faith. (Marg. Ref. p—r.—Notes, Heb. 11:39,40. 1 John 2:7—11.) So that the church, considered as a complex body, was in a state of pupilage and minority under the old dispensation; and the law served as a “school-master,” or tutor, to instruct it in the introductory lessons of religious knowledge, by many hard tasks and burdensome restraints, imposed with much salutary severity. This was so ordered, that Christ and his salvation might be the more welcome; and that the very yoke of the law might bring men to him, “that they might be justified by faith.” But when the great Object and doctrine of faith were publicly introduced, the church was no longer to continue under a school-master; but was to be admitted to a nobler liberty, and instructed in a more open and enlarged manner. (Marg. Ref. s—u.—Notes, 4:1—7. Matt. 11:28—30. Acts 15:7—11, v. 10.) As therefore, children are glad to be released from the confinement and discipline of a school; so believers should welcome the liberty and privileges of the gospel: and it was peculiarly absurd for Christians to be attached to the state of confinement, under which the ancient church had been held; and under the yoke of the legal dispensation.—This admits of an obvious accommodation to the believer’s experience, and the first use of the moral law in bringing men to Christ: but the above is the evident scope of the apostle’s argument.—‘God also fully pardoned the sins of the upright Jews, and freed them from the punishments of the other life; but not by virtue of the blood of bulls and goats, ... but by virtue of their faith in the Messiah, owned by them to be the Messiah their Righteousness.’ Whitby.

Note.—Even the Gentile converts were made at once “the children of God, by faith in Jesus Christ,” and admitted to the full privilege of that high relation, by union with him, and an interest in his atonement and righteousness. For “as many of them as had been baptized” according to Christ’s appointment, and thus admitted into his church, if indeed they were what that profession implied, had “put on Christ,” as their robe of righteousness. (Marg. Ref. y—a.) It is generally supposed, that the apostle alludes to the custom of baptized persons putting off their old garments; and putting on new, clean, or white raiment, after they had been baptized: but it is by no means certain, that this custom prevailed at so early a period; at least the sacred writers do not mention it. Indeed, the connexion of the twenty-seventh verse, with that which precedes, shows, that “the faith in Christ,” which was publicly professed in baptism, and not the mere outward administration, (whether the baptized person had faith or not,) was especially intended.—“God now looking on them, there appears nothing but Christ; they are, as it were, covered all over with him, as a man is with the clothes that he hath put on; and hence in the next verse it is said, they are all one in Christ Jesus, as if there were but that one person.” Locke. The learned writer indeed connects this high privilege with the profession of the gospel; but certainly it cannot belong to a hypocritical profession.—“The false apostles might urge, that circumcision was used even from Abraham: but the apostle answers, that baptism has succeeded to circumcision.” Beza.—“Baptism under the gospel, as the rite of initiation, is as effectual for making us the sons of God, as circumcision was under the law.” Macknight. We may also add, “And no more effectual.” (Notes, Rom. 2:25—29. 6:3,4. 1 Cor. 12:12—14. Col. 2:11,12. Tit. 3:4—7. 1 Pet. 3:21,22.) From the time, when any persons “believe in their hearts unto righteousness, and with their mouths make confession to salvation,” all other distinctions vanish: they are all members of the mystical body of Christ, and entitled to all its blessings, without any need of the Mosaic law. If then the Galatians did indeed belong to Christ; by faith, and the participation of his Spirit; they were become the spiritual seed of Abraham, and heirs of all the blessings covenanted to him; and had therefore no need of being proselyted to the Jewish law, or concerned in the abrogated Sinai-covenant.—The question, concerning the baptism of infants, is not at all affected by the apostle’s language in this passage: for the same way of arguing, by which some have attempted to prove, that they ought not to be baptized, because incapable of believing, would also prove them incapable of salvation; (Note, Mark 16:14—16.) and also prove, that the male infants of Israel ought not to have been circumcised.—The mention of “male and female,” in this connexion, and here alone, evidently refers to the difference between circumcision, as restricted to the males, and baptism which is administered to females also. (Marg. Ref. b—g.—Notes, 1 Cor. 7:10—14. Col. 3:7—11.)—“Slaves are now the Lord’s freemen, and freemen the Lord’s servants: and this consideration makes the free humble, and the slave cheerful.” Doddridge. (Note, 1 Cor. 7:17—24.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5.

The faithful preaching of the gospel so exhibits “Christ crucified,” as the great Object of the Christian’s faith, hope, and admiring love and gratitude; and so shows the nature, glory, and efficacy of his sufferings, from love to our souls; that he is, as it were, “evidently set forth before men’s eyes,” as dying upon the cross for their sins. But how very small a portion of the preaching in Christendom answers this description; or tends thus to excite men’s affections towards the gracious Redeemer, needs not be told. Alas! who has infatuated and bewitched men’s minds, that they should so generally turn away from this fundamental doctrine, to listen to metaphysical subtleties, fabulous and absurd legends, moral harangues, superstitious observances and forms, or enthusiastic reveries? It is plain, that “the god of this world,” by various instruments who reciprocally despise each other, has “blinded men’s eyes, lest the gospel of the glory of Christ should shine into them,” and lest they should learn to trust in a crucified Saviour, “God manifested in the flesh.” (Notes, 2 Cor. 4:3—6. 1 Tim. 3:16.) But we must observe, with equal grief and astonishment, the folly of numbers, who have often heard the gospel, most faithfully and pathetically preached; and yet have at length been fascinated by plausible deceivers, to refuse obedience to the truth. We cannot indeed appeal to miracles, and extraordinary gifts of the Holy Spirit: but we may boldly demand, Where are “the fruits of the Spirit” most evidently brought forth? among those, who preach justification by the works of the law, or those who preach the doctrine of faith in a crucified Saviour?—They who have begun to fear God, to seek mercy, to pray, and to renounce sin, under the preaching of the gospel; must be foolish indeed, if they think to make further proficiency by returning to legal dependences, or resting on external observances. It is most grievous to see those who have gone through sharp convictions, and even endured persecutions, for attending on the gospel, afterwards turning aside, and giving cause to fear that they have “suffered so many things in vain.” Indeed any affliction endured, without profit derived from it, should be considered as a cause for sorrow and humiliation; and if the Lord loveth us, we may be assured, that further and sharper chastisements will follow.

V. 6—14.

We should aim in every good thing to be “followers of those, who through faith and patience inherit the promises,” and have “obtained a good report:” and for this end, we ought to study the Object, nature, and effects, of Abraham’s faith. (Notes, Gen. 22:1—10. P. O. 1—12. Notes, Rom. 4: Heb. 6:13—15. 11:8—19. Jam. 2:21—24.) Those who partake of his faith shall surely inherit his blessing; and if we can ascertain that this is our case, we may be sure of sharing all his privileges. But who can, in any other way, escape the curse of the holy law? Who has “continued in all things written in the book of the law to do them?” Who will venture to demand life on this ground? Let us learn to distinguish accurately in this matter. “The law is not of faith:” every law of God, and every legal covenant, must be perfectly distinct from “the covenant of promise,” through faith in Jesus Christ: and if we confound these things, we shall find a curse instead of a blessing. The redemption of all, who ever were or shall be saved, was paid by the great Surety of the new covenant, when he was “made a curse for us,” and “bare our sins in his own body on the tree:” but the sufferings of this “holy One of God” more loudly warn sinners to “flee from the wrath to come,” than all the terrors of Sinai, or the curses of the law itself: for how can it be expected, that “God will spare” any man to whom sin is imputed, seeing “he spared not his own Son;” when our sins were imputed to him? (Notes, Ps. 32:1,2. Rom. 4:6—8. 8:32—34, v. 32. 2 Cor. 5:18—21.) Yet at the same time Christ, as from the cross, and from the throne of glory, most graciously beseeches sinners to take refuge in him; and with accents of the tenderest love invites even the Gentiles, to accept of the blessing of Abraham, and to seek for the promise of the sanctifying and comforting Spirit, the earnest of our inheritance, by faith in him!

V. 15—22.

No subsequent transactions, or external alterations, can “disannul or add to that covenant,” which engages eternal life to every believer: that “promise cannot be made of none effect.” Yet let us not think, that the law was given in vain. The Sinai-covenant and the ceremonies of the law have answered their end, and, being fulfilled in Christ, are no more in force: yet are they still replete with instruction to believers; though a better covenant is made with them through that great Mediator, whom “all the angels of God worship.” But, as the law of Moses was never contrary to the promises of God, to Abraham and his Seed; but served as “a school-master,” to bring the church to Christ for justification by faith: so it would be most absurd to suppose, that the holy, just, and good law of God, the universal standard of duty, is contrary to the gospel of Christ; as it is in every way subservient to it, when properly understood and used. If a law was ever given to fallen man which could give eternal life, this must be it; and “then righteousness is by the law, and Christ died in vain:” but instead of this, the law brings in the whole world “guilty before God,” and shuts up every man under sin, without hope or remedy from any other quarter than the gospel; while the excellency of its precepts demonstrates the justice of the sinner’s condemnation. In this wretched condition Christ finds us all as transgressors; and the promise of eternal life is freely given by him to all that believe, but to them exclusively. (Note, Rom. 3:19—26.)

V. 23—29.

Men in general, even under the gospel, continue shut up as in a dungeon, as loving their chains; being blinded, intoxicated, and lulled asleep by Satan, through worldly pleasures, interests and pursuits. But the awakened sinner discovers his dreadful condition. The more he examines, or labors to escape, the fuller conviction he receives that he cannot effect his own deliverance: then he learns, that the mercy and grace of God form his only hope; and, though his doctrinal knowledge may be scanty, he is “shut up to the faith, that will shortly be revealed” to him. (Note, Eph. 5:8—14, v. 14.) The precepts and sanction of the law urge him on to duty, and restrain him from sin; even while they discourage him and fill him with terrors: and thus, by a kind and beneficial severity, the law is made use of by the convincing Spirit, to show him his need of Christ, and to bring him to rely on his righteousness, propitiation, and mediation, “that he may be justified by faith.” Then he ceases to be under the tuition of the law, as “a school-master,” and to be alarmed by its terrors, except as he lives beneath his privileges: yet the precept becomes, by the teaching of the Spirit of Christ, his guide in the delightful path of evangelical obedience, his beloved rule of duty, and his standard of daily self-examination. In this use of it he learns continually to depend more simply on the Saviour; and it puts energy into his prayers, and endears the promises to his soul. Thus sinners “become the children of God by faith in Christ,” and, being “baptized into him,” by the converting grace of the Holy Spirit, they put on Christ and stand accepted in him; and all, who thus belong to him and are one with him, are “the children of Abraham, and heirs according to the promise.” (Notes, Rom. 4:9—17. 11:16—21.) But no outward forms or profession can ensure these blessings; for “if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his.” (Note, Rom. 8:5—9.)

CHAP. IV.

The ancient church had been under the law, as a young heir under a guardian 1—3. Christ came to “redeem those that were under the law,” and to give believers both Jews and Gentiles “the adoption of sons,” 4—7. The apostle shows how absurd the conduct of the Galatians was; in that, after having been delivered from idolatry by the gospel, they willingly subjected themselves to the bondage of the law: and he expresses his doubts concerning them, 8—11. He tenderly expostulates with them, for becoming alienated from him, to whom they had expressed the most fervent love; ascribes this to the influence of false teachers; and shows the adior of his soul in longing for their salvation, 12—20. He illustrates the subject of the two covenants, by showing, that the history of Sarah and Isaac with Hagar and Ishmael was an allegorical representation of them, 21—31.

2 But is under tutors and governors, until the time appointed of the father.

3 Even so we, <sup>b</sup> when we were children, were <sup>c</sup> in bondage under the * elements of the world:

Note.—The argument and illustration, of the preceding chapter are here continued. (Note, §:26—29.) The heir of an estate, during his minority, is excluded from the possession of it; and even kept in subjection to guardians and tutors, who lay restraints upon him as if he was a servant; though in fact he is the proprietor of the whole inheritance. And this continues till the time “appointed by his father,” in his will or otherwise, for his coming of age, and being put in possession of the estate. (Marg. Ref. a.) Thus the church was held in a degree of bondage under the Mosaic law, till the coming of Christ; as being in its childhood, and under tuition. These observances are called “the elements of this world.” They taught the simplest rudiments of religious knowledge, as the alphabet contains the first principles of science; (Notes, Heb. 5:11—14. 6:1—3.) and the external ceremonies of that dispensation were suited to the ideas of worldly men, and in many things similar to the rites of other nations; rather than the most suitable means of spiritual worship, or adapted to those, who were matured in spiritual judgment and affections. The splendid temple, the priests in their sacred vestments, the multiplied sacrifices and religious festivals, and other things of the same kind: when their typical meaning and use were undiscerned or neglected, were coincident with the gross apprehensions of carnal men concerning God and his worship. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. c.—Notes, 8—11. John 4:21—24. Col. 2:8,9,16—23. Heb. 7:11—17.) Unbelievers had always thus perverted them; and even believers were held in comparative darkness and bondage, by so many external observances.

4 But when <sup>d</sup> the fulness of the time was come, <sup>e</sup> God sent forth his Son, <sup>f</sup> made <sup>g</sup> of a woman, <sup>h</sup> made under the law;

7 Wherefore <sup>o</sup> thou art no more a servant, <sup>p</sup> but a son; and <sup>q</sup> if a son, then an <sup>r</sup> heir of God, through Christ.

Note.—“When the fulness of the time” was arrived for the coming of the Messiah, which God had purposed in himself, and made known by prophecy; and which the state of the Jewish nation, and of mankind in general, showed to be peculiarly suitable for the introduction of a new and more enlarged dispensation: then God “sent forth his own Son,” One with him in the divine nature, to become “manifest in the flesh;” assuming human nature into personal unity with the Deity, by his miraculous conception in the womb of the virgin, that he might be made, or born, (as some copies read it,) of a woman, and be emphatically her seed, by receiving his human flesh of her substance. (Marg. Ref. d—g.—Notes, Gen. 3:14,15. Is. 7:14. Jer. 31:21,22. John 1:18. 3:16.) ‘He ‘was therefore the Son of God, even, yea, properly, in respect of his Deity. Beza. Thus he was also “made under the law,” being born of a Jewess, and the reputed Son of a Jew, and circumcised: that so, being “under the law,” as a covenant of works, he might, as the Surety of the church, in every way answer its full demand. (Marg. Ref. y.) This was done voluntarily, without any previous obligation. As “the Son of God,” he was not subject to any law; as a perfectly holy man, he was not bound to submit to the ceremonial law, which in every thing implied man’s sinfulness. But he was pleased, for between thirty and forty years, to tabernacle here on earth, in perfect obedience to the whole law: and at length to give himself, a spotless sacrifice of infinite value, “to redeem those, who were under the law,” and its righteous curse or condemnation, from that awful curse; (Note, 3:10—14.) and likewise to redeem the church from the ceremonial law; which was a kind of bond given for future payment by the Surety, of the debt due to divine justice for the sins of those, who had obtained forgiveness by faith in the promised Saviour. (Marg. Ref. i.—Notes, Rom. 3:21—26. Eph. 2:14—18. Col. 2:13—15.) Thus instead of the yoke of ceremonial obedience, and that slavish spirit which in many cases it
